MANSION-HOUSE.—A SOLICITOR.—On Tuesday, George Potter, who was several days ago charged by Mr. Charles Fosbrook Mackenzie with having misappropriated a bill of exchange for 100*l.* given to him to get discounted, appeared for the purpose of undergoing another examination. Mr. Mackenzie, it will be remembered, employed the defendant as an agent for negotiating the bill, but never received a farthing, nor the bill, nor any thing else except promises from Potter, who studiously avoided him. At last he received a letter from a person named Wood, stating that he held the bill, having advanced 25*l.* in cash and goods upon it, and ultimately he was sued by a Mr. Chisholm, solicitor, of No. 3, Cook's-court, Carey-street, to whom the bill was indorsed by one George Colson, to whom it was indorsed by one Clarkson, to whom it was indorsed by Wood. Mr. Chisholm stated on a former examination that the only person he knew in the matter was Colson, who collected debts for him, and brought him cases upon which he sued; that he had given valuable security for the bill, and that there was a long account between him and Colson, in which the latter was his debtor. Efforts were made to bring forward by means of summonses the several parties whose names were on the back of the bill, but nobody appeared except Mr. Chisholm, who attended with the bill, upon which he said he had been instructed by Wood to sue. Mr. Peter Chisholm produced the bill for 100*l.* He had received it from Colson, and it was made payable at Ransom's, in Pall-mall. It was in consideration of a long account between them. Mr. Wontner then proceeded in his examination of the witness. Mr. Wontner—"Is Colson your clerk?" Witness—"He is not." Mr. Wontner—"Is not his name on your door?" Witness—"Yes; but I do not call him my clerk." Mr. Wontner—"Is he your partner?" Witness—"No; he brings me business." Mr. Wontner—"Is he not your clerk?" Witness—"You may call him my clerk, if you please." Mr. Wontner—"Do you pay him a salary?" Witness—"No. If he brings me business, I generally make him a present." Mr. Wontner—"Does he take share of the profits of your business?" Witness—"No; I give him what I please. I give him, perhaps, 5*l.* if he brings me what produces 20*l.*" Mr. Wontner—"If he do not bring you business which produces a profit, do you not give him any thing?" Witness—"Nothing." Mr. Wontner—"Has he not entered appearances, and done other things as your clerk?" Witness—"He may have done so in the cases he has brought me himself, but not in any other business." Mr. Wontner—"Have you seen any affidavits, or other documents, to which he has sworn as your clerk?" Witness—"No." Mr. Wontner—"Did you swear, in the case of Hutchinson and Co. that Colson was your clerk?" Witness—"No." Mr. Wontner—"Did you not swear, in a case of fraudulent bankruptcy, that he was your clerk?" Witness—"I might have done so, but in the opinion of the judge, the case was not one of fraudulent bankruptcy." Mr. Wontner—"Do you know who Mr. Clarkson is?" Witness—"No; but Colson told me he was a very respectable man. Colson indorsed the bill for me, as a matter of course, to sue upon." Mr. Wontner—"What passed at the time?" Witness—"Nothing passed." Mr. Wontner—"Can you tell me when it was indorsed to you?" Witness—"No." Mr. Wontner—"Had you any settlement of accounts at the time?" Witness—"No." Mr. Wontner—"Did you enter the transaction in your books?" Witness—"No; the bill was indorsed to me before it was due." The Lord Mayor—"When the bill was dishonoured, had the parties on the back of the bills notice of the fact?" Witness—"They had." The Lord Mayor—"Where do the indorsers live?" Witness—"I do not know. I never knew any but Colson." Mr. Wontner—"When were the notices of dishonour sent?" Witness—"I do not know. I heard from Colson that they had been sent." Mr. Wontner—"How many persons do business in this way with you?" Witness—"I decline answering that question; I consider it a very impertinent one." Mr. Wontner—"How many persons practise in your name?" Witness—"No person practises in my name." Mr. Wontner—"And you do not know Mr. Clarkson?" Witness—"I do not." Mr. Wontner—"Who presented the bill for payment?" Witness—"One of my clerks presented it." Mr. Wontner—"Do you not know Potter?" Witness—"I never saw him before I saw him here in this transaction." Here the name of Colson was called three times, but no answer was returned; neither did any of the indorsers appear, although pains had been taken to find out their places of abode. Mr. Wontner thanked the Lord Mayor for the readiness with which facilities had been afforded him in tracing the nefarious transaction, in which a gentleman had been deprived of his bill, without having received a single farthing for it, and said that it was the intention of the complainant to proceed against Potter and Wood by indictment at the Central Criminal Court for conspiracy. Potter was then discharged, the Lord Mayor being prevented from committing him by the neglect of Mr. Mackenzie to give a written notice to the defendant with the bill, intimating that he was to return it if he did not succeed in getting it cashed. The bill was then returned to Mr. Chisholm. The whole of the case attracted a great deal of curiosity and attention.

Accident to Mr. Justice Cresswell.—On Saturday night last, as Mr. Justice Cresswell was proceeding from Appleby to Lancaster, his carriage was overthrown in descending a steep hill on the north side of Borrowbridge, Westmoreland, but we are happy to say that neither his lordship nor his attendants sustained any injury beyond a trifling shock in the fall.

The Small Debts Act.—The difficulties in either understanding or following out this incomprehensible and hasty piece of legislation are only just beginning to develope themselves. The other day, at the Bankruptcy Court, Mr. Sturgeon applied for a summons against a debtor, who resided at Hatfield, some seventeen miles from London; but a difficulty arose as to the party who was to serve the summons, and the amount of remuneration for his labour, and for his own part he was free to confess that he did not understand the Act. Mr. Commissioner Fonblanque said he should much wish to know who either did or could understand it; but, with respect to the service of the summonses, that must be done by the officers of the court, and the 3s. 4d. (only) allowed for such service must be increased upon taxation of costs. [A journey to Hatfield and back to be performed for 3s. 4d.!]

The Drainage Bill.—Sir J. Graham's Bill for the improvement of the sewerage and drainage of towns and populous districts, for making provision for a more ample supply of water, and for otherwise promoting the health and comfort of the inhabitants, has been printed for the purpose of being circulated throughout the country during the approaching parliamentary vacation. Like most such Bills, it is very bulky and diffuse; the heads of the clauses of themselves occupy a space of seven pages. Ample provision is made for the election of commissioners by the ratepayers and for the appointment of inspectors, &c. Towns are to be provided with an effective system of sewerage, and the inspector of the district is required to furnish the commissioners with an estimate of the cost of the sewerage works. All sewers are to be vested in the commissioners, and to be placed under their control. The commissioners are required to construct new sewers where required, and to purchase and remove all obstructions to drainage. Private drains are to be made from houses, to communicate with the sewers, and no houses must be built without drains. The level of new houses to be fixed by the commissioners. Vaults and underground cellars must not be constructed without the consent of the commissioners, and drains, privies, and cesspools must all be kept in good order, and subject to inspection by the officers of the commissioners. The latter functionaries are also empowered to cause streets to be cleansed, highways to be watered, and dust and ashes to be removed. A medical officer is to be appointed, subject to the approval of the Secretary of State, to inquire into and report upon the sanatory condition of towns and districts; such officer to make post mortem examinations when required by the coroner. The commissioners may further order filthy and unhealthy houses to be cleansed and whitewashed. An "inspector of nuisances" is to be appointed for the superintendence of the general execution of the provisions of the Act, and for receiving complaints and laying informations when necessary. Slaughter-houses and knackers' yards are to be registered, and regulations made for their cleanliness, &c. The inspector is to make a report on the sufficiency of the supply of water, and to state the best means of increasing that supply, if necessary. The commissioners are also empowered to contract with water companies for a supply of water. Power is likewise given to purchase springs of water by agreement, under the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act. Sewers-rates, paving and general rates, are to be made for the purposes of the measure, to be levied upon occupiers of houses, &c.

Billiard and Bagatelle Tables.—In the new Act to amend the law concerning games and wagers, which has just been printed (having received the royal assent on Friday week), there are several provisions respecting the regulations to be enforced as to the keeping of billiard and bagatelle tables. Persons keeping inns, ale-houses, and victualling houses, are to apply to the justices at licensing sessions to grant licenses at their discretion to keep billiard and bagatelle boards, or instruments used in any game of the like kind. The licenses are to be annual, for which a sum of 6s. on each is to be charged. With regard to places other than those mentioned, and which abound in the metropolis, licenses in Middlesex and Surrey are to be taken out after the 5th of April last, and elsewhere after the 10th of October next; and during the continuance of such licenses the words "Licensed for billiards" shall be conspicuously exhibited. Persons keeping such places without licenses are to be considered as keepers of common gaming-houses, and proceeded against accordingly; and, on conviction, in a summary manner to pay or be committed to prison. Billiards are not to be played "after 1 o'clock, and before 8 of the clock in the morning of any day," nor on Sundays, or other days appointed to be kept as a public fast or thanksgiving. All constables and officers are empowered to enter places where billiards or bagatelle are played as often as they think proper, and on refusal to be admitted, the keepers to be deemed guilty of an offence against the tenor of their licenses.

Nice Calculation.—One of the official assignees at the Bankruptcy Court has lately declared two dividends upon an estate, the first being to the amount of eleven-sixteenths of a penny in the pound, and the second a farthing and half-farthing in the pound.—Evening paper.

Documentary Evidence.—The Act to facilitate the admission in evidence of certain official and other documents, which was issued yesterday, contains seven provisions. Its operation is to commence in November next, and not to extend to Scotland. Official documents are to be received in evidence without proof of the seal or signature affixed. All courts are to take judicial notice of the signatures of equity and common law judges. Judicial notice is likewise to be taken of private Acts, proclamations, and other matters issued by the Queen's printers. Persons forging a seal or signature to be tried for a felony, and, on conviction to be either imprisoned or transported. The documents forged are to be impounded on application by the party against whom they were admitted, or by the order of the presiding authority.

Palaces and Poor's Rates.—The question whether the inhabitants of Royal palaces are liable to be rated for the support of the poor is again to be contested. At the petty sessions at Staines, on Tuesday, application was made on behalf of the parish of Hampton for distress-warrants against the inhabitants of Hampton-court Palace for enforcing the payment of poor's-rate. In 1839 the matter was tried, and a mandamus was obtained from the judges of the Queen's Bench, ordering the magistrates to issue warrants for the rate, which, after a long delay, had been paid. Since then, however, no other rate had been paid by the occupants of the palace, as the question, it was alleged, had not been properly tried, and there are arrears due to the amount of 3,000*l.* It is now intended to raise the question again, but the granting the warrants was postponed for further consideration.

The late Sir William Follett.—We are glad to find that the proposal to erect a monument to the memory of our late distinguished representative, in this his native city, has been taken up in earnest, and under auspices which can leave no doubt of its being satisfactorily accomplished. A preliminary meeting was held at the Guildhall, yesterday, at which the mayor presided, and which was attended by the Right Hon. the Earl of Devon, S. T. Kekewich, esq., Montague B. Bere, esq., Dr. Shapter, J. Carew, esq., H. Hooper, esq., J. Gidley, esq., and other influential gentlemen of the city and neighbourhood. Resolutions in favour of the proposed object were unanimously adopted—a committee was appointed—and a subscription amounting to 100*l.* was entered into on the spot.—Western Luminary.

Will of the late Mr. Balfour.—The will of James Balfour, esq. late of Whittingham-house, Haddington, North Britain, and Grosvenor-square, London, lately deceased, has just been proved in England. The personal estate within the province of Canterbury, sworn under 80,000*l.*; that in Scotland sworn to as exceeding 100,000*l.* The executors are Dame Eleanor Balfour, the widow; James Maitland Balfour and Charles Balfour, the sons; the Right Hon. the Earl of Lauderdale, the Hon. Sir Anthony Maitland, Edward Stanley, esq. and John Balfour, esq. the nephew of the deceased. The will was made in February 1844, and there are four codicils, the two last were made in February 1845. The testator has bequeathed to his wife, Lady Eleanor (third daughter of the late Earl of Lauderdale), an annuity of 3,760*l.* charged upon the estates; also a legacy of 31,000*l.* with full permission to reside at any of the mansions, Whittingham, Balgonie, or Grosvenor-square. To his eldest son, James Maitland Balfour, he has devised the lands and barony of Whittingham; and to his son Charles he has devised the Balgonie estate, and has bequeathed to him a legacy of 47,000*l.* and the sum of 20,000*l.* to rebuild the mansion at Balgonie and to refurnish the same. His daughters are provided for under their respective marriage settlements. He has left pecuniary bequests to his grand-children, nephews, nieces, and others, and legacies and annuities to his servants, and has appointed his eldest son residuary legatee.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE LONDON COMMERCIAL ASSOCIATION AND CREDITORS' PROTECTION SOCIETY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

Sir,—I am directed by the committee of the above society to say that they regret neither you nor your publisher could with convenience attend the meeting of subscribers on Wednesday last; they feel that had you have done so, much gratuitous scandal and falsehood would have been spared, as you would have had the advantage of your own observation, unprejudiced by the questionable motives of envious correspondents and interested reporters.

In answer to the queries of your last number, I am desired to inform you that this association has for its object the cheapest and most effectual mode of redress for commercial men against the present easy and reckless mode of insolvency. The prospectus of the society has been sent to creditors, they being most immediately interested in its advancement. In several instances an objection has been made to the payment of yearly subscription, and it was suggested originally by some creditors themselves that they would not object to pay one guinea for the single opposition of a debtor, of whose conduct they had reason to complain, if others would join them. As this course would not compromise the object for which the society is established, but rather forward it, the letter complained of has been adopted by me, and written on the prospectus which contains the names of the acting committee, the officers, and a numerous list of names of gentlemen well recognised by the trading world.

The animus of this letter has been quite misunderstood by you; it was not for the purpose of "begging opposition," or of putting money into the solicitors' pockets, but by publicity to intimate to creditors who wish to oppose a fraudulent man, that they might do so through the aid of the society, rather than suffer him to escape through the great expense of opposing in the usual course; and the committe have thought it so important a feature, that they have adopted it as one of their rules and regulations.

Every shilling as yet received has gone to the funds of the society, and has been accounted for to the treasurer, and applied towards defraying its expenses.

The solicitors hitherto employed have nothing whatever to do with the society beyond their professional attention to its business in court; they are employed by and under the control of the committee of management, who are at liberty to employ any other solicitor or counsel, if they think proper. As yet the solicitors have not received any thing. Insolvents are opposed upon the request of creditors, and not by direction of the committee.

The writer of the letter signed "A Looker On" also requires notice from me. This person, whoever he is, has unhappily chosen a wrong designation, as he must have been wilfully blind to the facts, in asserting that Mr. Buchanan and myself were "the only persons forming the entire corpus of the society," when the very prospectus to which he alludes contains the names and addresses of the acting committee! The falsehood of the assertion must be evident to you, for the copy of the report, signed by four gentlemen, was in your possession two days prior to the publication of your last number. This "Looker On" can, it appears, coolly inform you that he has seen things that never occurred! The attorney has never opposed any case for ten creditors, "who, of course, paid him a guinea a-piece." I dare say there is no attorney in the kingdom who would not be glad to do so, if he could get the chance, and I am quite certain, from my own experience, no barrister would object to a fee of ten guineas from ten combined creditors. I beg to add, in conclusion, that this society was not projected or established to please any portion of the legal Profession.

If the lawyers choose to object, we cannot help it; but the commercial public will, I trust, know how to appreciate our exertions.

I am, Sir, yours, &c.

James M. Constable, Secretary.

CREDITORS' PROTECTION SOCIETY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

Sir,—In an article in your last number on the Creditors' Protection Society, we were not a little astonished at these words:—"The solicitors are paid by the society to oppose a certain insolvent. But they also apply to the other creditors, offering to oppose for them for another guinea a-piece." If the words "they" is to apply to us, we beg to say distinctly that the assertion is untrue, and we regret to add we think it wilfully so! We have issued no circular letter!—We have not violated professional etiquette!—We have not interfered, or been allowed to interfere, in the conduct or management of the society in question!—We have received not even one guinea directly or indirectly for any opposition for the society, as our bill is at present unpaid. It is really much to be lamented that such sweeping attacks should be made in your paper, without first inquiring into the facts. We beg to add, that we have had nothing more to do with the association than simply to oppose when instructed.

We understand that you and your publisher had an invitation to attend a meeting on Wednesday last, but it appears the opportunity to see, hear, and judge for yourself was declined!

We are, Sir, your obedient servants,
BUCHANAN and GRAINGER.

THE LOST WILLS FROM DOCTORS' COMMONS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

SIR,—A country client of mine has good reason to know that one of the wills lost from the Prerogative Registry (respecting which a petition has lately been presented to the House of Commons from Mr. John Thomas Scott, formerly a clerk in that office), is a will of an ancestor of his, and under which he holds a very considerable real estate; he has written to me to inform him in what way he is to proceed, such will being required to be produced at the assizes before one of the judges on a trial as to title, or if such judge can accept the registered copy, that being the next best evidence in existence; or must the Government pass an Act to authorise such copies to be admitted in place of the originals? It is a question that my legal knowledge does not enable me to answer, but perhaps some of your learned correspondents may take the subject under their consideration, as it appears to me to be a question of some importance.

I am, Sir, yours, &c.
AN OLD SUBSCRIBER.

P.S.—The above is not to answer a legal question, but simply one of the deepest importance to every practitioner in both branches of the profession.

ATTORNEYS' CERTIFICATE DUTY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

SIR,—I observed in your paper some little time since that Sir Thomas Wilde was going to present a monster petition to the House of Commons for a repeal of the duty on attorneys' certificates; has he done so?—if not, what has been done with the petition, and what steps have been taken in the matter?

I am, Sir, yours, &c.
J. T. SHAPLAND.

THE LAW TIMES.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 16, 1845.

THE SMALL DEBTS BILL.

THIS measure has not only become a law, but is already in operation. It appears in its proper place, out of order of chapters, but claiming precedence because of its importance.

As the LAW TIMES was the parent of the plan, it is natural that we should take in it a more than common interest. It is therefore with very great regret that we observe the many and grievous imperfections with which a scheme, admitted to be so excellent in substance, has been matured by those who undertook the task of moulding it into a statute. These imperfections, amounting almost to impracticabilities, will be set forth specifically in subsequent articles, of which the first appears below. Our business here is only to complain that the experience of the Profession was not listened to in its progress, and to protest emphatically against the local courts scheme, which has been so insidiously carried under cover of a measure having upon the face of it no such design, and therefore virtually an imposture upon the Profession and the public, who received almost at the same moment the news of the proposition made and of its being made law, without discussion had upon it, or opinion taken from any of those whom it most affected and by whom its tendencies are best understood.

The provision enabling the Privy Council to enlarge the jurisdiction of all local courts to 20*l*. is a change far more extensive than any ever before proposed by the most enthusiastic supporters of local courts.

To those who are acquainted with the practical working of local courts this transference to them of all debts under 20*l*.—that is to say, of four-fifths of all the debts sued for in the kingdom—is fraught with so much evil, that it is to be hoped the Privy Council will not use the power vested in them, at least until another law shall have improved the constitution and regulated the proceedings of these courts.

Much as the Small Debts Act was required, and excellent as is its principle, far rather would we have seen it abandoned altogether than that it should have passed with so many imperfections of its own, and with such a mountain of mischief as, by a manœuvre more ingenious than creditable, has been piled upon its back.

But the deed is done, and lament is useless. As there is no hope of its repeal, endeavour should be directed to its improvement. This must be the subject of frequent discussion in the LAW TIMES, as experience shall exhibit its working. A statute so defective in machinery, so loose in its language, will afford infinite scope for judge-made law. It is impossible to predicate what constructions will be put upon it. The only citable authorities by whom it will be judged will be the Commissioners of Bankrupts, for the judges of the Local Courts will scarcely be deemed admissible. Instructions have therefore been given to our reporters to pay special attention to the decisions of the Bankruptcy Commissioners on this statute, as they will necessarily determine the practice in all the minor courts. For some time to come this must be a very large and very important feature of our reports, and we shall be obliged by authenticated decisions from those of the country Commissioners' Courts where we have not yet been able to find a legal reporter.

SHAM LAWYERS.

THE following is a production of one of this tribe:—

Accountant Office, Butcher's Row,
Banbury, Aug. 6, 1845.

SIR,—I am instructed by Mr. Edward Leatherbarrow, of Nelthrop, to apply to you for the sum of 2*l*. 2*s*. 8½*d*. in which you stand indebted, and I am further instructed to inform you, that unless the above amount, together with 2*s*. the cost of this letter, is paid to me at my office on or before Thursday, the 14th Aug. inst. legal proceedings will be forthwith instituted against you.

I am, Sir, yours respectfully,
J. HOWELL.

Mr. Dixon, Glazier.

CREDITORS' PROTECTION SOCIETY.

THE letter of Mr. CONSTABLE, the Secretary, replying to the queries submitted last week, will be found among our correspondence. We are bound to say that the explanation is, in all respects, perfectly satisfactory. It appears that the circular to creditors emanates from the Society, and that their contributions to the opposition are paid to the treasurer, and form a portion of the funds of the Society. This removes altogether the suspicion that attached to the form of this application, and relieves the solicitors, Messrs. BUCHANAN and GRAINGER, from the doubts which the circular in question had excited in the minds of so many of our correspondents. As now explained, there is nothing in the matter that can be deemed either unprofessional on their parts, or censurable on the part of the Society.

We would, however, recommend that no opposition to any debtor be made without an order from the committee. Such a sanction is necessary to secure the confidence of the public. The principle of the Society is admirable, and it needs only to be well conducted to command extensive support and do incalculable good.

TO READERS.

MR. COX'S Small Debts Act, with notes and a copious index, is now ready. It has been added to the series of the Law Times Edition of Important Statutes.

MR. ALLNUTT'S edition of the important Real Property Statutes of the late Session, with forms and index, is in active preparation. It will be published in about a fortnight. As these statutes do not come into operation until October, we have preferred to have them got up with the care and completeness necessary for the practitioner, to a hasty, and probably imperfect, publication.

VERULAM SOCIETY.

THE 14th and 15th numbers of Real Property and Conveyancing Cases, and the 10th and 11th numbers of Practice Cases, are published.

The Registration Cases, to the present time, are complete in one part, price 5s.

A number of new forms have been added to the list. Among others, a series of the Common Trustee Clauses in Wills; the Power of Sale and Common Covenants in a Mortgage; the Common Covenants in a Conveyance of Personalty.

A complete list of the Office Forms and other Publications of the Verulam Society is now ready, and will be forwarded to any applicant post free.

THE SMALL DEBTS ACT.—HASTY LEGISLATION.

WE have often heard of the superior aptitude of the Lords' House of Parliament for the business of legislation, and especially for that branch which relates to forensic jurisprudence; but we must confess that we have seen little proof of this excellence. Now and then, a blunder which has escaped the Commons has been detected by the Peers; and more frequently, errors, discovered in the course of discussion by the press and by the public, beyond the boundaries of the mystic walls, have been corrected in those last stages of parliamentary progress which usually take place in the Lords. The true test, however, of legislative aptitude, the entire preparation and completion of a great measure, seems to be wanting to that noble house. We have looked in vain for one, and were about to give up the search, when we heard a hawker crying, —"LORD BROUGHAM'S SMALL DEBTS BILL, only one penny!" Here should have been our "ευρηκα"—here was a bill, rendered necessary by an error in a former measure of that noble and learned lord; a Bill which had passed through a select committee of titled sages, and which had received the tacit approval of the Lord Chancellor, and, therefore, by implication, of her Majesty's Government. We say tacit, for though we traced from time to time, in the newspapers, that the Small Debts Bill had passed through its various stages, we saw no debate—nothing that could lead us to any knowledge of its principles or enactments. That some such measure was imperiously called for we well knew, but how the blunder of the previous Act was to be explained, excused, justified, or corrected, remained, and we must add, still remains, a mystery. A measure involving the interests of trade to an enormous amount—involving a change of jurisdiction throughout England—involving totally new principles of law, and reversing or disregarding established principles of jurisprudence—has passed through both Houses with as little discussion as a turnpike Act or common inclosure Bill. But though we have not found that of which we were in search—the philosopher's stone of legislation!—a perfect measure, emanating from, and completed by, the wisdom of the Lords, we have been led to a very useful inquiry; to one in which, if we can induce our readers to join us, results are likely to arise much more important than the perfection or imperfection of this or that specimen of legislation. How are laws made?

Let us then pursue this Small Debts Act through its causes, concoction, and completion; and let us consider with what degree of confidence it ought to inspire the public, in the wisdom, foresight, deliberation, diligence, and discretion of those who, by the fictions of the constitution, are supposed to be responsible for the enactment of our laws.

Towards the close of the session 5 & 6 Vict. two bills were suddenly laid on the table of the House of Lords by Lord Brougham, and were read a first time, as is the custom of that house, without notice or observation. With one of these, entitled "An Act for facilitating Arrangements between Debtors and Creditors," and which did not pass till 7 & 8 Vict. we have no present concern; the other was "An Act for the Relief of Insolvent Debtors," the avowed object of which was to give to unfortunate persons who, without any glaring misconduct, had become unable to meet their pecuniary engagements, an easier mode of relief than that already afforded by the Insolvent Debtors Court; and as it was supposed to be in contemplation to abolish that court, in pursuance of the recommendation of the commission of inquiry of 1839, by which means from twelve to fifteen thousand pounds a year would be saved to the public, it was not unreasonable that this new jurisdiction should be transferred to the Court of Bankruptcy. This bill passed almost sub silentio in the Lords; and if any debate did take place in the Commons, it escaped public attention amid the usual hurry of the close of the session. The ostensible object of the measure was to adopt the principle of cessio bonorum, and to save from the squalor carceris the very few who might be denominated meritorious debtors. That the bill had not been very deliberately prepared, was obvious on the face of it; and it had not been in practical working for many weeks (we might almost say days) before it became obvious that it must quickly add to the number of instances in which a considerable part of the business of every session has been to correct the errors of its predecessors. We had therefore, in the 7th & 8th Victoria, "An Act to amend the Law of Bankruptcy, Insolvency, and Execution;" but as it is the practice of certain travelling artists never to mend one hole without at least preparing the advent of another, to be botched in the like manner at their next visit, this bill contained a clause which filled the legal world with astonishment and the trading world with dismay. It abolished execution against the person for debts under twenty pounds! and provided no remedy, either for the discovery of property, or the punishment of fraud or improvidence in the contraction of such debts. This clause was inserted in the Bill at an advanced stage, without notice or explanation (at least as far as we can learn), and, as in the case of other measures relating to bankruptcy and insolvency, at the very close of the session, and when the common lawyers, who might be supposed most conversant with such a subject, were absent on the circuits. Now the history of the clause is said to be this. A noble and learned lord, from whose high position and conservative principles we should expect the coolest caution in reform, and the sternest resistance to unconsidered innovation, being greatly shocked at the description of some borough prison, in which numerous debtors were confined in crowds, and in filth shocking to decency and to humanity, could find no better remedy for this evil than a general and sweeping confiscation of all debts under twenty pounds. "Everybody was ordered to discharge everybody;" that is, everybody owing no more than twenty pounds, exclusive of costs, to any one creditor, however large might be the collective amount of his debts. No one thought of inquiring how many thousands, or hundreds of thousands, of his debts were due under this amount—no one thought of inquiring how many traders there were, the whole of whose book debts were in small sums, and who must be brought to ruin by this ex post facto sentence of forfeiture; no one thought of the shock to credit which this sudden change was likely to produce—no one thought of the effect which this denial of a remedy for the recovery of small debts was calculated to produce on the poor man, who might have occasion to contract them. One image only was presented to the eye of the legislator—the crowded cell of ———! Would it not have been easier,—would it not have been more consistent with general principles of jurisprudence, to have applied a direct remedy to the evil? Had it escaped the memory of the learned lord that there were such persons as inspectors of prisons? Might he not have enacted that no Court should imprison except in a place reported fit for the reception of prisoners? and even, that, till proper places could be provided, the Small Debt Courts should have the power of committing to the county or other public gaol? We have, indeed, heard that suggestions to this effect were made; but sic volo is the rule in high places; and towards the end of a session, reason is seldom heard and argument is deemed impertinent. There is no time for public remonstrance, and perhaps before next February individual opposition, like Sir Abel Handy's fire, "may go out of itself."

And this is no bad calculation. It requires no ordinary portion of wrong to excite such a movement as will force the attention of Parliament to a by-gone subject unconnected with party politics. Pheasant's eggs, dog-stealing, or horse-racing might stand a chance of reiterated discussion; but small debts, very small debts, such as peers and members of Parliament can easily pay; bankruptcy of vulgar traders, or insolvency of little shopkeepers, are uninviting subjects, on which forty members in the Commons, or three in the Lords, can seldom be collected in cool deliberation or earnest debate.

But we must continue this topic next week.

THE CRITIC.

New Books.

The Law of Railways, including the three General Consolidation Acts, 1845, and the other general Acts for regulating Railways in England and Ireland, with copious Notes thereon; also the Standing Orders of Parliament as to proceedings on Railway Bills, with Forms, &c. By LEONARD SHELFORD, Esq. of the Middle Temple, Barrister-at-Law. London, 1845. Butterworth.

THE mania for railway speculation has produced a very flood of literature dedicated to the same all-engrossing theme. Within the last month four daily and half-a-dozen weekly railway journals have started into existence, to perish as rapidly as they have risen, when shall come the turning of that tide of madness which has been flowing unchecked with ever-widening sweep.

The lawyers have reaped the full share of the golden harvest which the folly of the many has poured into the laps of the few. They are largely concerned in railway enterprise as well as in railway speculation. Railways have become in themselves an important branch of our national establishments. Although of recent introduction, they have engaged the special notice of our Legislature, and the Courts are constantly engaged in matters that have grown out of them. It may be readily supposed that so large a field for aspirants to legal authorship would not long remain unoccupied. But writers have partaken the mania of the speculators. One good treatise would have been sufficient; but a dozen at least are announced, and it was a struggle which should make his first appearance. Mr. SHELFORD has succeeded in getting the start of his rivals, and his portly volume proves that the time has arrived when a distinct work upon the subject is justified by the bulk of law already dedicated to railways.

But Mr. SHELFORD has by no means exhausted the subject. His book is not a treatise, nor a substitute for a treatise; it is simply a collection of the statutes relating to railways, with notes. These notes, however, are copious, and arranged so as to form brief essays on the topic under discussion. They conveniently follow in the body of the text, but in a different type from the section of the statute to which they respectively belong. All the most important appear to be noted up, and although there is nothing in the volume for which the compiler can claim the merit of originality or the title of author, he has shewn himself a diligent and judicious collector. The notes classify themselves under such headings as the Construction of Statutes; Agreements before the Act is obtained; the Provisional Formation of the Company; the Incorporation of the Company; the Transfer of Shares; Compulsory Purchase or taking of Lands; the Crossing of Roads and Construction of Bridges; of Proceedings by Mandamus against Railway Companies; of Indictments against them; of the Writ of Certiorari; of Proceedings by Injunction. Such a work affords no matter for extract, but we can recommend it as an excellent manual to serve until the appearance of a formal treatise.

The Orders of the High Court of Chancery from Hilary Term 1828, to Trinity Term 1845, as at present applicable to the practice, with the Cases decided under each Order. By R. LEVINGE SWIFT, Esq. of the Middle Temple, Barrister-at-Law. London, 1845. O. Richards.

THE utility of this work will be apparent from a perusal of its title-page. The orders now in force are collected and arranged according to their subjects in alphabetical order, and appended to each are all the reported decisions upon them. A copious index affords a further means of reference. Mr. SWIFT has executed his task with diligence.

A Review of the principal Facts connected with the Rise, Progress, Conclusion, and Character of the recent State Prosecutions in Ireland. By a Barrister. London, 1845. Longman and Co.

THE Irish state trials appear to have been destined to display, in an exaggerated shape, all the absurdities that yet infest our jurisprudence and its forms of procedure. The monster indictment, the monster trials, the monstrous law of juries, of conspiracy, of evidence, therein propounded, the judgment passed, and the judgment reversed, must have astonished civilized Europe, and perplexed Englishmen, accustomed to boast so largely the perfection of wisdom with which their laws were framed. But if it should have directed public attention to the subject, and so promoted the reform of barbarities and absurdities hitherto known only to lawyers, the trials that have agitated our own time, and which will lower us in the estimation of an unprejudiced posterity, will not have been without their value.

Presented, as were the facts at the time of their occurrence, from day to day, and one by one, it was impossible to have an adequate notion of the character of the whole affair. It is not until they are viewed in combination, that an estimate can be formed of the huge mass of faults and follies comprised in that proceeding. The purpose of the curious and amusing volume before us is, to review the entire trial, to point out its bad laws and bad arguments; to examine the decisions of the judges both in Ireland and in England, and try, by reference to the authorities, how far those judgments were in accordance with the principles of our common law and the dictates of common sense.

This task has been performed by the author with excellent temper, rare research, and singular as-tuteness. No disputable point escapes his vigilance; no judge can trip for a moment unnoticed by him: he tracks the counsel and the judges through all the windings and doublings of their arguments, detecting every fallacy and exposing every error. He revels in the work of destruction, demolishing the logic of the Bench and the Bar, with an evident enjoyment of his work, and with the perfect ease of one confident alike of his own capacities and the weakness of his opponents. The law of conspiracy, as laid down by Mr. Attorney-General SMITH, and sanctioned by the judges, is the especial object for attack. Its absurdities are mercilessly exposed; its consequences are shewn with telling effect; its errors are quietly detected; its principles vehemently denounced.

It would not be exactly within our province to follow the author through his elaborate review; enough to say, that it is singularly powerful, learned, and eloquent, and, as containing a great deal of constitutional law, will instruct as well as amuse the reader. It should go down to posterity by the side of the volumes that will contain the record of the extraordinary trials whose proceedings it reviews.

THE NEW RAILWAYS OF THE SESSION.—Now that the most eventful session of Parliament recorded in railway history has reached its close, we are enabled to announce, from our official returns, the following as the great results of its legislation. Parliament has sanctioned the construction of 2,090 miles of new railways in England and Scotland, and of 560 miles in Ireland. This is in effect to double the extent of the railways of Great Britain, exclusive of Ireland. The capital authorized to be raised in shares for this purpose amounts to 31,680,000*l.* exclusive of 6,800,000*l.* required for the Irish lines, making in all 38,480,000*l.* to be applied in England within the next two or three years for our own railways. The cost of the new railways per mile will be thus very much less than that of existing lines. The average of the new is nearly 15,000*l.* per mile, and that of the old exceeds 30,000*l.* per mile. It will thus be seen that the amount to be provided for the new railways is not so enormous as has been supposed from the number of bills before Parliament. At the same time it is sufficiently large to require serious consideration, and to arrest the progress of reckless speculation. 10,000,000*l.* a year for the next three years can be easily spared by a nation whose annual savings are calculated to exceed 50,000,000*l.* By an investment of these 30,000,000*l.* profitably, the country will be enriched, and multitudes benefited both at present and permanently. At the same time the demand for money, when the calls for these works come to be made, will be sufficient to put a check upon all idle and foolish schemes, such as those against which we have warned our readers. The expected revenue from these new lines considerably exceeds 2,000,000*l.* sterling per annum.—Railway Chronicle.

THE NEW ORDERS in CHANCERY, with Practical Notes and a copious Index for Office Uses.

By G. S. ALLNUTT, Esq. Barrister-at-Law.

Price 3s. boards.

"The above Orders come into operation on the 28th of October next; consequently a well-arranged edition of them is absolutely requisite for both branches of the Profession. Mr. Allnutt's work possesses so many advantages, that we cannot refrain from recommending it to the attention of those for whose benefit it has been compiled; and we can conscientiously say that, in the hurry of business, this little work, from its size, price, well-arranged, copious, and accurate index, and the clear, concise, and explanatory notes which are attached to it, will be found peculiarly valuable, and answer the purpose of the practitioner far better than a more elaborate edition."—Sun.

Distribution of the duties in the Master's office—Master's clerks—Act of 3 & 4 Wm. 4, c. 94.

Whether the Act of 3 & 4 Wm. 4, c. 94, or the course of practice in the Masters' offices, has so defined the respective duties of the Masters' chief and junior clerks, that the Master cannot properly make any other arrangement or distribution of such duties.

Whether the Master's chief clerk is a permanent and judicial officer, irremovable by the Master except for misconduct, or whether he is the mere clerk of the Master, who may be removed at pleasure.

Although the Lord Chancellor and the Master of the Rolls have not fully heard the arguments on this petition, or pronounced any opinion upon its merits, yet as the substance of the case on both sides has been so completely stated in the arguments of Mr. Romilly and Mr. Stuart, and the question is one which excites an unusual degree of interest in the Profession, we report it so far as it has proceeded.

This case came before the Court upon a petition of thirty-two of the solicitors of the Court, which complained of an alleged irregularity in the performance of the duties of the chief clerk in the office Master Lynch. The petition is as follows:—"That the petitioners are, and for many years have been, solicitors duly admitted to practise, and actually practising, in this honourable court, and in the course of their said practice the said petitioners have the conduct and management of suits in progress through the offices of the Masters in ordinary, and divers of the petitioners have now the conduct and management of suits in progress through the offices of the Masters in ordinary, and divers of the petitioners have now the conduct and management of suits in which references have been directed to Mr. Lynch, one of the said Masters, and which references are still pending.

"That the officers in the said Master's offices consist of the Masters themselves and their chief clerks, a copying or junior clerk being attached to the separate office of each of the said Masters.

"That, according to the usual course and practice of the said offices, it is the duty of the chief clerk to assist in the prosecution of all inquiries and accounts referred to the Master to whose office he is attached, in which the exercise of the personal discretion of the Master is not involved; and it is likewise, according to the same practice, the duty of the said chief clerk to prepare the drafts of the reports of such Master, and to settle such reports in the presence of the solicitors concerned.

"That a very large amount of the business of this honourable Court is, in fact, transacted by attendance before the chief clerks of the said Masters, and that in the prosecution of suits in the said Master's offices, the solicitors of this honourable Court have to attend before the chief clerk more frequently than before the Master, and that it is of the highest importance to the interests of the suitors of the Court, as well as due to the solicitors of the Court, individually and as a body, that an officer before whom such solicitors have to lay statements, and to whose judgment they are called upon to defer, should not be selected from a lower rank in society than themselves, and should be qualified by his station to attain their respect and confidence.

"That from the earliest time the said office of the chief clerk to any of the said Masters in ordinary has been executed by the holder thereof for the time being in person, and not by deputy.

"That the copying or junior clerk in the office of each of the said Masters is usually a person who was clerk to the Master while at the bar, and that the duty of such copying or junior clerk is to wait personally upon the Master, and to receive the fees in the office, and to make the appointments for attendance before the Master and the chief clerk respectively, and to enter and copy accounts, reports, and proceedings.

"That by an Act of Parliament passed in the session of the third and fourth years of the reign of his late Majesty, King William the Fourth intituled, 'An Act for the Regulation of the Proceedings and Practice of certain Officers of the High Court of Chancery in England,' it was, among other things, enacted, that no person should be appointed to be chief clerk of any Master in ordinary of this honourable Court, unless he should have been admitted on the roll of solicitors or attorneys in one of the courts of Westminster-hall, for not less than five years, or should have been a junior clerk in the office of one of the said Masters for a term of ten years. And it was thereby, among other things, further enacted, that each and every of the Masters in ordinary, registrars, and clerks of the said registrars, masters of reports and entries, clerk of affidavits, and examiners of this honourable Court, should hold their said offices during their good behaviour, and so long as they should personally give their attendance upon their respective duties, and should conduct themselves honestly and faithfully in the due execution of the duties of their said offices respectively; and that the officers and clerks in the several offices of this honourable Court should give their personal attendance in their respective offices during the times they should so be directed to attend, as by the said Act provided, unless otherwise engaged in the business of their respective offices, or prevented by sickness or other unavoidable cause. And it was further enacted, that there should be paid by the Accountant-General of this honourable Court, out of the fund to be placed to his account, to be entitled 'The Suitors' Free Fund Account,' to the several officers named in the schedule thereunder written, the several salaries or yearly sums set opposite to their respective names or titles in such schedule, being (among other things), the salary or yearly sum of 1,000*l.* to the chief clerk of each of the said Masters in ordinary, other than the Accountant-General, and the salary or yearly sum of 150*l.* to the junior clerk of each of the said Masters; and it was further thereby enacted, that it should be lawful for the copying or writing clerk of the said Masters to receive and take the sum of $1\frac{1}{2}$d. per folio of 90 words, and no more, for every copy of every document or writing, or a part of any document or writing, made in the Master's offices, from the parties requiring the same, and also for the transcript of every report, and that such sum of $1\frac{1}{2}$d. per folio should be retained by the said writing or copying clerks to be employed by the said Masters in their respective offices; and that no part thereof should be received or retained by, or applied to the use or benefit of, any other person or persons, on any pretence whatsoever.

"That in the month of December 1843, Andrew Henry Lynch, esq. one of the said Masters in ordinary, appointed Thomas Whiting, who had then been copying or junior clerk in the office of another of the said Masters for more than ten years, to be chief clerk of him, the said Master Lynch; and in the month of June 1844, the Lord Chancellor was pleased to order that the salary of 1,000*l.* provided for persons filling the said office of chief clerk, should be paid to the said Thomas Whiting, since which time the said Thomas Whiting has annually received such salary.

"That notwithstanding such appointment of the said Thomas Whiting, and such receipt by him of the said salary, he has never performed, or in any manner attempted to perform, and does not now perform, the important duties belonging to the said office of chief clerk to the said Master Lynch, but that such duties have been ever since his said appointment performed by, and the same are now continuing to be performed by, Edward Wright, the junior or copying clerk in the said office of the said Master Lynch, who is not himself qualified according to law for the office of such chief clerk, and by such means the duties of chief clerk to the said Master Lynch are, in fact, performed by a deputy and an unqualified person; and the said Thomas Whiting has ever since his said appointment performed the duties of copying or junior clerk, and no other duties, in the said offices of the said Master Lynch; and the petitioners believe that the said Thomas Whiting is, in fact, incompetent to discharge the duties of chief clerk to the said Master.

"That the petitioners are advised, and humbly submit to the Lord Chancellor, that an office of so much trust and importance as that of chief clerk to one of the said Masters ought not to be executed by deputy, and that to permit the same to be so executed would be establishing a principle injurious to the interests of the suitors of this court, and contrary to the true intent and meaning of the said Act of Parliament, and would have the effect of depriving the said suitors of the security intended to be given to them by the said Act, for the performance of the the duties of the said office by persons possessing the experience and legal attainment indispensable for the efficient discharge thereof; and the petitioners, in their character of solicitors to this honourable Court, and also as representing the interests of the suitors of this honourable Court confided to their care, feel aggrieved by the premises.

"That the petitioners therefore pray your lordship to cause inquiry to be made into the matters aforesaid, and into the manner in which the duties of the office of chief clerk to the said Master Lynch are now, and have been since the appointment of the said Thomas Whiting thereto, been executed and performed. And that your lordship will be pleased to order that henceforth the duties of the said office may be performed by the said Thomas Whiting while he shall continue such chief clerk in person, and not by the copying or junior clerk of the said Master, or by any other deputy; and that in case the said Thomas Whiting shall neglect personally to perform such duties, or shall be found incompetent thereto, that he, the said Thomas Whiting, may be removed from being such chief clerk of the said Master Lynch, and that in such case your lordship will be pleased to make an order for the due appointment of some other proper qualified person to the said office of chief clerk in the place and stead of the said Thomas Whiting."

Romilly (with R. Palmer) supported the petition.—They stated that the late chief clerk in the office of Master Lynch died in November 1843. By the statute of the 3 & 4 Wm. 4, the necessary qualifications for a person obtaining the situation of chief clerk to the Master, is either that he should have been a solicitor of five years' standing or have been a junior or copying clerk in the Master's office of ten years' standing. At that time Mr. Thomas Whiting was employed as an assistant clerk to the junior or copying clerk in Master Lynch's office. Mr. Whiting had been junior or copying clerk in the office of Master Cross for a period of nineteen years. Upon Master Cross's resignation, Mr. Whiting became an assistant clerk to the junior or copying clerk in Master Lynch's office, he receiving such payment for his services as was agreed between him and the junior clerk, being under the control of the latter.

The Lord Chancellor.—Are assistant clerks to the junior or copying clerks recognised by the Act of Parliament?

Romilly.—They are not. Mr. Whiting at this time having a qualification of ten years' service as junior or copying clerk in Master Cross's office, he was appointed to the situation of chief clerk in Master Lynch's office. There are three rooms in the Master's office. The outer room, wherein the junior clerk sits; an inner room, in which the chief clerk sits; and a third, or more remote room, is that of the Master. Mr. Whiting occupies the first office, and performs the duties of junior, or copying clerk, while Mr. Wright, who is not qualified to be chief clerk, sits in the second room, and performs the chief clerk's duties. The duties of chief and junior clerks are not altered by the recent Act 3 & 4 Wm. 4, c. 94, although their relation towards the public has been materially varied. The Commissioners for inquiring into the salaries and emoluments of officers of courts of justice, who made their report in 1816, have entered fully into the duties of the Masters' clerks. Under the head of the Court of Chancery, they say:—

Clerks to the Masters in Ordinary.

"There are attached to each office two clerks; one is the chief clerk, and who, as stated in the report of 1740, ought to be a person of good ability and knowledge in the practice of the court; the other is the copying clerk. We have called for returns from the principal clerks only, because they alone appear to us to be 'officers, clerks or ministers of justice,' within the meaning of the commission. They receive fees given to them directly by the order of 1743, and have the general superintendence of the business under the Master; but the copying clerks have no emolument whatever, except what they derive from a salary allowed by the Master, or a proportion of the fees belonging to him or the principal clerk, and seem to have no other duty but what their description imports —that of making copies for the use of the suitors. The duties of the principal clerks are to keep a register of the warrants or summonses issued from the office, and of the names of the clerks in court and solicitors who attend the returns thereof, by which register the costs are afterwards taxed; to arrange and preserve the records, deeds, books, and other documents in the office, so that they may at all times be readily found and produced when wanted; to attend the court with deeds, books, and papers; to draw and transcribe all certificates to be signed by the Master, and to draw and transcribe all reports after wards to be settled and signed by the Master, and to prepare the schedules to be annexed to the report. This duty of drawing the certificates and reports requires that the principal clerk should be not only familiar with the usual course of business, so as to prepare the certificates and reports, for which there are established forms, but he must know enough of the general law and practice of the Court of Chancery to understand the orders and decrees pronounced by it, differing almost in every case; he must make himself particularly acquainted with such of these orders and decrees as are referred to his office; with the proceedings before the Master, and with his decisions on the points before him; and he ought to be able to arrange the whole in the form of a report, in order to be ultimately settled by the Master.

"The principal clerks are also employed in making calculations, for which purpose they ought to be ready accountants. These duties shew, that the principal clerks should be persons of education, and of great skill and experience in business.

"It is also the duty of the chief clerk generally to assist the Master in the execution of the various duties of his office.

"It is represented to us that many of the solicitors, not being familiar with the practice of the Master's office, advise with the principal clerks as to the mode of prosecuting the suits and other matters depending there, and occupy by that means a considerable portion of their time; and, upon the whole, that their business requires them to be fully occupied in office hours, and the employment of a considerable portion of their time beyond such hours, and also on holidays and vacations."

Romilly.—Such is the statement of the duties of the chief clerks to the Masters.

The LORD CHANCELLOR. The report designates the principal clerks to the Masters officers, clerks, or ministers of justice."

Romilly.—I will undertake to shew they are such. They are in the nature of judicial officers, for they have to decide from time to time upon the periods to be allowed to different parties to pass their accounts.

The LORD CHANCELLOR. Does Mr. Whiting receive the salary of chief clerk to his own use, without accounting for it, or allowing any thing to the junior clerk?

Jas. Parker (for Mr. Whiting).—He make no allowance, directly or indirectly.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—You state, Mr. Romilly, that there is no dispute about the facts. Is that so? The question seems to turn on what the duties are; whether the Master can regulate the duties.

Romilly.—There is no dispute about the facts that Mr. Whiting is the chief clerk in Master Lynch's office, and that the duties of that situation are performed by Mr. Wright, the junior or copying clerk.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—Are those facts admitted?

Stuart.—I appear in this case for Master Lynch. The controversy is, whether the Master has power over the appointment and distribution of the various duties of the office of the Master amongst his clerks.

Romilly.—The defence raised to this petition is that the Master h[illegible] be performed by the chief clerk and junior clerk in his office.

The LORD CHANCELLOR. The office of chief clerk is a known office, because the Act of Parliament recognises it, and gives a salary for the performance of distinct duties. It requires a certain qualification for the situation. If the facts are such as they are stated to be, it is not right that a person should be performing the duties of the office who is not qualified according to the regulations of the Act of Parliament.

Romilly.—The office is not only a known one, but an old one. In the time of Richard the Second, there was an order that there should be six clerks to the Master of the Rolls, which is, no doubt, the origin of the office of the Six Clerks in Chancery. In the reign of Henry the Fifth there was an order that the Master should have only one clerk. From the very earliest period the clerks to the Masters were considered to be officers of the Court. In the time of Elizabeth there was a custom, now obsolete, that clerks to the Masters should have seats at the table in the hall of the Lord Chancellor. By an order of Lord Chancellor Jefferies, in 1688, it was directed, that the Masters' clerks should not examine witnesses, which shewed that at that time the Masters' chief clerks were encroaching on the duties of the Masters themselves. At the time when Sir John Trevor was Master of the Rolls, an order was made that the clerks of the Masters should not solicit business as solicitors upon pain of suspension from their office, which proves that they were treated as officers under the control of the Court. (Sanders, 405.) In 1743, Lord Hardwick made a table of fees which were to be taken by them, distinct from the fees payable to the Masters. So in the Orders of 21st December, 1833, certain fees are directed to be taken by the Master's clerk; and by the 24th of those Orders it is directed that certain special applications "shall be entered, in a book to be kept for that purpose in the office of the Master, and shall be then marked by the said Master, or his chief clerk, as entered," &c. This shews them to be recognised officers of the Court, having the performance of defined duties. In the evidence given before a committee of the House of Commons in 1833, Master Farrer, in answer to the question whether the second clerks do business for the chief clerks sometimes, said, "No, I believe not; I think they are not competent to it." From this short statement, then, of their history, it will appear that the Masters' clerks are officers of this Court, over whom the Lord Chancellor has control, and that they are always subject to the control of the Lord Chancellor, although appointed by the Masters. It is clear that the Master cannot impose on the chief clerk the performance of any other duties than those for which he receives a salary and fees, under the provisions of 3 & 4 Wm. 4, c. 94. Since that Act, the Masters hold their offices by patent, but the Masters' clerks are now in the same position as the Masters themselves were before that Act; they are still appointed by the Masters; but are practically irremovable, except for misconduct. Before that Act, the Masters were appointed by the Lord Chancellor, and could be removed by him; now they are appointed under the authority of an Act of Parliament, and hold their offices during good behaviour. Upon the impeachment of Lord Macclesfield for the sale of the Masters' offices, the answer to that charge was, that the office of Master is not a judicial office within the meaning of the words of the statute of Richard 2; but that they were only clerks of the Lord Chancellor, as the chief judge of the Court of Chancery; that they are not "officers and ministers of justice" (the words used in the statute of Richard 2); but Lord Macclesfield was found guilty, which could have only been upon the ground that the office of Master was that of a minister of justice. It is impossible to say that they are not officers and ministers of justice, for the purpose of performing the duties required of them in their office as Masters. The Act of Wm. 4 requires them (the chief clerks) to be solicitors of five years' standing, or to have been in the situation of junior clerk for ten years. I ask this question, as to the appointment of these clerks, What is the qualification for? Is it merely that they should take and enjoy their salaries, and not perform the duties of the office? Is it that a person should receive the salary attached to the office who is a solicitor of five years' standing, or had been a junior clerk for ten years? The qualification in the Act forbids a Master in Chancery to allow any person to fill the office and perform the duties of chief clerk who was not so qualified; and if a separate qualification for the performance of the duties is to be permitted other than that which is required for appointment to the situation, the whole intention of the Act will be defeated and abolished. It is clear those duties cannot be performed by a deputy, from the language of the 21st section of the Act, which is as follows:—

"That the several offices of the High Court of Chancery shall be and continue open for despatch of business during such hours in the day, and that the officers and clerks belonging thereto shall attend in such offices in the discharge of their several duties, during such times, &c. as the Lord Chancellor, &c. [illegible] y orders direct; and that the officers and clerks in the said respective offices shall give their personal attendance in their respective offices during the time they shall be so directed to attend, unless otherwise engaged in the business of their respective offices, or prevented by sickness or other unavoidable cause."

It is quite clear that that clause in the Act of Parliament is intended to enforce the personal attendance of the chief clerks to the Masters in the performance of the duties they are bound to perform. The clerks are to give their attendance in their respective offices. The Master has no power to appoint the copying clerk to perform the duties of the chief clerk, he not having the proper qualification for that purpose directed by the statute. There is no qualification necessary for the appointment of copying clerk in the Master's office; the persons appointed to that situation are generally those who have been clerks to the Masters when at the bar, and who, neither by their education nor a knowledge of the practice of the Court, are competent to perform the duties of the chief clerk of the Master. In the Earl of Shrewsbury's case (9 Coke, 49), it is stated to be a presumption of law, that a judicial officer cannot perform his duties by deputy. The onus lies on the officer to shew he can do it. In the matter of Bligh (4 Term Reports, 717), it is held there that the marshal of the King's Bench Prison should reside within the prison. That officer was not appointed by patent, but in the same way as the Masters' clerks are appointed.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—The question here is, whether the Master has a right to distribute or apportion the duties to be performed in his offices between his clerks.

Romilly.—I am contending that the Master cannot do that, for the duties of the clerks are defined by ancient usage and the Act of Parliament. It is quite impossible that the duties can be performed by the junior clerk, having regard to the qualification in the Act as to the office of chief clerk, for they are duties which no one but the chief clerk can perform.

The MASTER of the ROLLS.—What is the ultimate order propose

Romilly.—The petitioners ask the Court for an order referring this matter to the consideration of the three senior Masters of the Court to inquire and state what is the practice as to the duties of the chief clerk's office, and to report generally to the Court what are circumstances under which the duties of the chief clerk are performed in Master Lynch's office, and to state any special circumstances. I do not, in the first instance, ask your lordship to do any thing in the matter; I only at present propose that your lordship may obtain a full account of the whole transaction, and that, upon ascertaining the state of the case, your lordship should interfere in such a manner as you may think fit to meet the views of the petitioners. The ultimate order may be to enjoin any person from performing the duties of chief clerk who is not qualified according to the provisions of the Act of Parliament; and if the chief clerk in Master Lynch's office be found incompetent to perform his duties, that the office should be declared vacant.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—By what tenure does the chief clerk hold his office?

Romilly.—That does not appear to be settled.

The MASTER of the ROLLS.—There is no express provision in the Act on that point. There is an omission in the Act as to that.

Romilly.—That is so. There never has been an instance of the dismissal of a chief clerk of a Master. I believe the right to dismiss exists; it has been claimed by the Masters, but never exercised. It is impossible to doubt, from the facts of this case, but that there is some arrangement between these two clerks, for Mr. Wright, who performs the duties of the chief clerk, is not qualified under the statute.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—When will Mr. Wright be qualified?

Romilly.—In two years and a half.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—Is there any suggestion that it is arranged to give Mr. Wright the chief clerk's situation in two years and a half?

Romilly.—It is not suggested that there is any such arrangement, but it is obvious that there must be some arrangement between them for the performance of the duties of chief clerk by Mr. Wright. Serious consequences might arise from this state of things if permitted to continue, for the Court may hereafter have, perhaps, to decide some dispute between these parties as to which of the claimants is legally entitled to the situation and its salary. There is another consideration in this case, namely, that it is impossible not to see that the Master himself takes a very great interest in this matter.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—The Master, I suppose, takes this kind of interest in the matter, namely, to do what is right for the public benefit.

Romilly.—That gentleman performs the duties of his office with the greatest ability, diligence, and despatch; but still the petitioners feel bound to ask the Court whether it is right that the duties of the office of chief clerk should be performed by an unqualified person, and if it is not the bounden duty of the Master to appoint to the office the best qualified man he can, without favour or affection. It does not appear whether Mr. Whiting is competent or not to perform the duties of chief clerk, but it is a matter of inference that he is not a competent person, from his not performing the duties of the office himself. The Master has a trust to perform in the appointment of his chief clerk, and if an unqualified person is appointed, the office is ipso facto void. The authorities on that point are conclusive. (Coke, 1st Institute, 234 A; Dorrington's case, Hardress's Rep.; Ex parte Devereux, 2 Anstr. 483; and on re-hearing, p. 616, Lord Hobart's Rep.)

The LORD CHANCELLOR. The cases you have cited have reference to permanent offices. The Masters' clerks are removable.

Romilly.—The Masters' clerks are in practice irremovable.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—If that is so, it is remarkable that the Masters' clerks should have been omitted in the clause of the Act of Parliament, which directs certain officers to hold their offices during good behaviour.

Romilly.—I admit the right to remove them has been claimed, but never exercised.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—It is stated in the report of the time of Lord Hardwicke, that the chief clerk holds his office at the will of the Master. When the Master dies or resigns, does the new Master appoint a new chief clerk?

Romilly.—That case has never occurred. The right to remove has been claimed, but never exercised. By the common practice they hold their office irremovable by the Master.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—I feel satisfied that if we should be of opinion that there is an irregularity in this mode of performing the duties of the office of chief clerk, and we intimate our opinion on the matter to Master Lynch, he will readily act upon it.

Stuart.—I need not say that there is nobody who would be more ready to act upon any intimation of your lordship's opinion than Master Lynch.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—The question, then, is, whether this is a proper state of things consistently with the nature of the office and its duties.

Romilly.—One of the points of defence is, that there is no evil yet arising out of this proceeding.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—If the thing is an irregularity, it ought not to exist, even if there is no actual evil at present.

Romilly.—The duties at present are very well performed, chiefly through the personal assistance afforded by the Master, who desires to support his own appointment. The income of the junior clerk is 700*l.* or 800*l.* a year; he divides the copy money of three-halfpence per folio allowed by the statute with his assistants.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—The Legislature presumed that 150*l.* a year and what he could copy himself would be a sufficient compensation for his services.

The MASTER of the ROLLS.—Does the chief clerk receive the copy money?

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—The Act says that no person shall receive or retain any fees for his own use, except the copying clerk of the Master, who shall be entitled to three-halfpence per folio. The Act expressly says, neither to be received nor retained.

The MASTER of the ROLLS.—In this case the copy money is received by the chief clerk and paid over to the junior clerk.

Romilly.—This shews the anomalies to which the mode of transacting business in this office leads. The duties are distinct, and the performance of them cannot be apportioned at the Master's discretion. In 1 Sander's Orders, 359, there is an authority for such a reference to the three senior Masters to inquire into allegations of irregularity. Lord Eldon made a reference to the three senior Masters to inquire as to the mode of taking evidence in the Examiner's office. The matter is brought forward very unwillingly and reluctantly by the petitioners. They hoped the matter would have been prevented by some legislative enactment.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—Has any application been made to the Legislature on the subject?

Romilly.—There have been steps taken in the last two years to obtain some legislative enactment on the subject. The petitioners never thought this was the proper mode of bringing the matter before the Court. I beg to say that there is not the slightest intention in this case to cast any, the least, personal imputation on the conduct or character of Master Lynch—a gentleman for whom I, from long experience and knowledge of him, have the highest respect and esteem. All that is attributed to Master Lynch in the matter is, a want of judgment on the point.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—No one performs the duties of a Master better than Master Lynch.

Romilly.—I now ask your lordship to make the order the petitioners pray.

Roundell Palmer followed on the same side.—He referred to various sections of the Act 3 & 4 Wm. 4, c. 94, and cited Lane's case (2 Coke Rep. 16); Sparrow v. Reynolds (6 Bacon's Abridgment, 22).

Stuart (Campbell with him).—I appear in this case for Master Lynch, upon whom a copy of the petition has been served. If the complaint in the petition is well grounded, it is of a very serious character. The general scope of the petition is a complaint that the duties of the office of chief clerk are now separated by the Master; that the office is a freehold not held by the will of the Master; that the duties of the office are now exercised by a deputy, and that the person who holds that office is incompetent to perform its duties. This latter charge, although made on a former occasion, is this day abandoned. [Romilly.—No.] Then if it is not abandoned, the imputation of incompetency remains on this gentleman's character; and yet, although this is the petition of thirty-two solicitors of the court, not one of them has ventured to make an affidavit stating that this gentleman is incompetent. The only person who made an affidavit in reference to the petition is a gentleman, a solicitor, but who is not one of the petitioners. I deny the whole groundwork of the petition. There is no ground for the complaints that are made; they are of a trivial character, and they ought not to have been brought forward. If complaints of this sort are to be brought forward, involving serious allegations against highly important judicial officers of the court, and they fail in establishing them, nothing can be more improper or mischievous, and at the same time injurious to the interest of justice, and derogatory to the dignity of the Court. The Act of 2 Hen. 6 declares that judges and other judicial officers are responsible for the performance of the duties of their respective offices, for which they shall answer at their peril. Master Lynch is a judicial officer of the court, and will be responsible for the mode in which the duties of his office are conducted by his chief clerk. The Master has the right of appointing or discharging his chief clerk, who only holds his office during pleasure. I need not say how willingly Master Lynch will attend to any suggestions which your lordships might feel disposed to make to him on the subject, knowing as you do that gentleman's anxiety to perform the duties of his office with all due despatch, and with all talent and ability with which it is admitted he discharges the duties of his office. I hope that if your lordships make any suggestions to the Master on this matter, you will do it by an order upon this petition. None of the petitioners have attempted to say that the business in Master Lynch's office is not well discharged and performed by the distribution he has made of the business between his clerks. According to the argument for the petitioners, the Master is to be responsible for the performance of the duties of his office; and yet he is not to have a discretion in allotting the duties of his clerks, and the method of doing the business of the office as he should think fit. If he has not that discretion, the business of his office cannot go on. If the Master's discretion is fettered, his responsibility is thereby diminished. It is clear the Master has, and ought to have, the right to dictate from time to time to his chief clerk what duties he should perform in the office. Mr. Whiting, in answer to these complaints, has made two affidavits, in the first of which he states that since the time of his appointment as chief clerk, except prevented by sickness or unavoidable cause, he has duly and regularly given his personal attendance at the Master's office, during such times and days as have been directed by general orders of the Lord Chancellor and the other equity judges; that he has always been willing and ready, during the whole of such period, and, in fact, has duly and regularly performed all such duties of the office as the Master from time to time required and directed him to perform; that he never performed any of the duties assigned to him by the Master by deputy; that for twelve years he has been assistant-clerk in the offices of the different Masters, and nineteen years junior clerk in Master Cross's offices; and that after Master Cross's decease he was assistant-clerk in Master Lynch's office for three years. That the actual difference between the salary of the chief clerk and the junior clerk is not great, as the salary and emoluments of the junior clerk often exceed 700*l.* and sometimes 800*l.* in the year. He believes that the whole of the business depending in Master Lynch's office is as efficiently, regularly, and expeditiously performed as in any other of the Masters' offices. In his second affidavit Mr. Whiting states that, among the duties he has regularly performed by the direction of the Master, as stated in his former affidavit, are to keep a copy and register of all warrants and summonses issued from the office; the names of the solicitors who attend the returns thereof; the arranging and preserving the records, deeds, books, and other documents of the office, and to be ready to find them and produce them when necessary; to receive and keep accounts of all fees payable to the fee-fund, and he has been informed and believes that in some of the other Masters' offices, these duties are performed by the junior clerks; and the deponent has also to prepare reports of receivers' accounts, certificates of allowance of interrogatories, certificates for commissions, orders for further time to answer, amend bills, and enlarging publication. These are most of the duties which have been referred to in the report of 1816; and although the Master's chief clerk is mentioned by name in the Act of Parliament, it is only for the purpose of modifying the fees payable by the suitors, and for payment of certain salaries out of those fees.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—The Act of Parliament states a qualification for the chief clerks; it does make them removable, but only declares that they should have a certain qualification.

Stuart.—One of the material allegations of the petition is, that, according to the course of practice, it is the duty of the chief clerk to assist in inquiries and accounts in which the personal discretion of the Master is not involved; and to settle reports in the presence of solicitors. Now, according to the commissioners' report of 1816, the duties are not described as undeviatingly performed in precisely the same manner. One of the commissioners who made that report was Chief Baron Alexander, who had himself been for many years a Master. The petitioners' description of the duties divides them into five classes, and of these four are regularly performed by Mr. Whiting. I propose to read a paper upon the duties of the Masters' clerks by the late Master Stephen, which states that the Master distributes the business amongst his clerks.

Romilly.—The distinction between the chief and junior clerk is, that the former hears arguments in which cases are cited, and allows or disallows various disputed items in the presence of the solicitors.

Stuart.—That is not one of his enumerated and alleged duties. The effect of the success of the petitioners' application would be to cripple the authority of the Masters by exalting their subordinates. The evidence given by Master Farrer in 1833 was referred to on the other side; but the most important part of that evidence with reference to the Masters' clerks was omitted. That evidence shews the chief clerk's duties to be merely ministerial, and done as the mere assistant of the Master. Mr. Farrer's examination was this:—

"Is there a great proportion of the business done by the chief clerk without the intervention of the Master himself, except for the purpose of affixing his signature, or doing something to give authenticity to the instrument?—The chief business of that kind is, passing receivers' accounts, and going through discharges; a great part of them are merely ministerial—merely checking the items with the receipts, and unless a difficulty arises, the chief clerk goes through them. If there is any question of allowance, the chief clerk always refers to the Master; he never determines questions to any amount, where a right is concerned, without referring to the Master.

"With regard to reports, is it the practice for the Master to draw the report, or the material part of it, or is that left to the clerk?—Generally speaking, that duty is left to the clerk; sometimes the Master draws the report, where it is of a special nature, where he thinks he can draw it from what passed before him with more facility.

"Is that done upon receiving short minutes from the Master?—States of facts are laid before the Master, answering certain directions of the Court, and the Master indorses upon them 'allowed,' with such notes and observations as he thinks may be useful for preparing the report; and I believe the Master usually, where the matter is litigated, states shortly the ground of his decision. The Master goes through the whole decree in that way; the chief clerk takes up the papers and sees what the Master has done, and from the Master's notes and minutes he draws the report, answering each order, with each state of facts before him. If any difficulty arises upon preparing the report, the parties come before the Master to settle it."

This is only just what is done by clerks in private offices. For expediting business, much of the mere labour of drafting is done by a clerk. Then in that part of Mr. Farrer's evidence which was read on the other side, they should have gone further.

Mr. Farrer's examination proceeds—

"The chief clerks have either been solicitors or managing clerks to solicitors?—Yes, generally; my own chief clerk was advanced from the situation of second to chief clerk. My former answer should be qualified, for he certainly for some time did great part of the business of the chief clerk. I speak of the time of my predecessor: I found him in the situation of chief clerk.

"Do you think it would be a proper provision to make, as now stated in the bill, that the chief clerks of the Masters in Chancery should hold their offices during good behaviour, and thereby be independent of the principal, the Master?—I think not.

"Do you think, if he were left dependent upon the Master, as heretofore, that the 13th clause, that requires that such chief clerk should have been an admitted solicitor for not less than five years, or have been a junior clerk in the office for not less than ten years, could fairly be brought into operation?—You would have equally respectable men accept the office, though they were dependent upon the Master; I do not think it would make any difference; there has been no instance of a Master dismissing his clerk, but I believe one, and that was for repeated drunkenness. The independence of the chief clerks might destroy the good understanding that has uniformly existed between them and the Masters. I believe the power of dismissal is a subject that never occurs to Masters or clerks; but the power ought to exist, and it ought to reside with the Master; if he is unworthy of being trusted with it, he is unworthy of his office.

"In that case he would be dismissable by the Chancellor?—Yes; the chief clerk has always been considered, and is in fact, as much the clerk of the Master as the clerk of any great banking establishment.

"Do you think, supposing the Master is put upon salary, independent of fees, in the character of a judge, and the clerk is still to be paid by fees, derived of course from the solicitors, that it would be necessary that there should be that dependence upon the principal kept up, in order to prevent any evil practices that might arise between him and the solicitor, through the payment of fees, if he were an officer wholly independent of the judge?—I think that is a material point of view, and would tend to keep the clerk more correct in his conduct."

The qualification required by the Act of Parliament, of ten years' service as a junior clerk, implies that the duties of the two clerks are analogous. In urgent cases the junior clerk is ordered to prepare the report.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—The question is, what are the precise duties which Mr. Whiting has to perform, and what does he perform? It is important that we should know that, in order to be able to come to a proper consideration of the case.

Stuart.—He performs all such duties as the Master, from time to time, directs him to do. I rest my case on the discretion of the Master, and I claim that right absolutely for him. The Master, in his discretion, has a right to direct his clerk to perform such duties as he requires of him, so that the business may be well done.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—We cannot hear the case any further to-day, nor can it be fixed for further discussion to-morrow, as there is a good deal of business in the paper to be disposed of, and I have determined to put an end to the sittings of the Court to-morrow. However, I will state to-morrow when it will be convenient for the Master of the Rolls to attend again in court with me to resume and conclude this discussion.

The case was not again mentioned during the sittings.

VICE-CHANCELLOR OF ENGLAND'S COURT.

Thursday, May 29.

JONES v. GEDDES.

Practice—Bankruptcy—Scotch heritable bond—Want of consideration—Injunction.

A bond had been given by a party charged upon his instrument was voluntary, and executed in contemplation of bankruptcy, the Court granted an injunction to restrain proceedings by the obligees upon a summons of ranking and sale until the hearing of the cause.

This was a bill which prayed that Charles Johnson and Sigismund Rucker might be restrained by injunction from proceeding with the summons of ranking and sale in the Court of Session in Scotland, and from instituting or prosecuting any such action or process in England, Scotland, or elsewhere, for the recovery of the moneys secured by the heritable bond for 5,000*l.* and for the sale of Belnageith until the defendants should have answered the bill. Archibald Leslie and William Smith were co-partners as provision-merchants in London, from 1st of September, 1840, until the 7th of September, 1843, when a fiat in bankruptcy was issued against them. Under this fiat the plaintiffs, E. Jones and T. Nesbitt, were appointed assignees, and Geo. Green official assignee. A certificate of the appointment of the plaintiffs as assignees was registered and recorded in the New General Registry of Sasines for Scotland, on the 15th of the same month of September. The bill stated that the joint estate of the bankrupts was greatly inadequate to meet the joint debts; that Archibald Leslie was at the time of the bankruptcy seised in fee of an estate of freehold in Scotland, called Belnageith, which was subject to divers incumbrances, including a heritable bond, and disposition in security, under the hand and seal of the said Archibald Leslie, dated the 9th of May, 1843, which recited that by the marriage contract between Archibald Leslie and Eleanor Atlee, the daughter of J. F. Atlee, on the 7th of July, 1823, J. F. Atlee settled a sum of 10,000*l.* upon his daughter, which was by the marriage contract vested in certain persons, and upon certain trusts therein mentioned, for the benefit of the said Eleanor Atlee and the children of the marriage; that some time after the date of the contract, J. F. Atlee lent the said A. Leslie the sum of 5,000*l.* for which A. Leslie gave his personal bond the express condition that A. Leslie should, whenever he was possessed of sufficient means, settle the sum of 5,000*l.* upon the children of the marriage; and on this occasion the solicitor wrote and addressed a letter to A. Leslie's spouse, stating that he had, at her request, handed the marriage settlement to J. F. Atlee, who, in his (the solicitor's) presence, had cancelled the bond given by A. Leslie, and requesting him to inform her that A. Leslie should settle the amount for the benefit of the children; and that, on the 28th of November, 1834, A. Leslie wrote on the back of this letter that he would fulfil the wishes expressed in it the first opportunity; and also reciting that A. Leslie's father died in 1838, and that the said A. Leslie, having then an opportunity of fulfilling his obligation, he, at the request of his wife and the trustees of the settlement, in consideration of the said sum of 5,000*l.*, thereby became bound and obliged himself to pay the 5,000*l.* to the defendants, Arthur Geddes, J. F. Atlee the younger, Chas. Johnson, and S. Rucker, the acting trustees under the settlement, for the purposes mentioned therein. And for further security and more sure payment of the money, A. Leslie thereby sold, alienated, and disposed, to and in the favour of their aforesaids, a heritable bond, but redeemable always in manner therein mentioned, all and whole the towns and lands of Belnageith, with the stock and teird, parsonage and vicarage, and that in real security and for payment to the defendants of the principal and interest of the bond. That, by virtue of the bond, and disposition and security and precept of sasine, the defendants were infeft and seised in the said lands in security for the said principal and interest. The bill, moreover, alleged that the personal bond stated to be cancelled was irrespective of the marriage contract, and bore date long after, and that it was not the fact that a condition was made on the cancellation thereof that A. Leslie should, whenever he was possessed of sufficient means, settle the said sum of 5,000*l.* upon the children of the marriage, but that the statement in the heritable bond of the 10th May, 1843, that such a condition was made on the cancellation of the said personal bond, was invented in the year 1843, and untruly stated, for the purpose of giving colour and an appearance that the heritable bond was granted for a valuable consideration. That such personal bond, if it ever in fact existed, was cancelled by J. F. Atlee, in order to release and extinguish the debt thereby secured, and without any condition or promise that A. Leslie should at any time, or under any circumstances, settle or secure the sum of 5,000*l.* upon his wife or the children of the marriage; and that the bond was voluntary, and executed by Arch. Leslie without any valuable consideration, while he was in insolvent circumstances, and in contemplation of bankruptcy: and by the law of Scotland, as well as by the law of England, was void as against the plaintiffs. That the

on the 1st day of November last, to prove their debt, and have the hereditaments sold for the payment of the alleged debt. The plaintiffs alleged that they could not effectually oppose the proceedings of the defendants in the Court of Session in Scotland, unless the heritable bond was declared fraudulent and void by the Court; and therefore the present proceedings were instituted for that purpose.

Bethell and Shapter, in moving for the injunction, contended that all the real estate of the bankrupt both in Scotland and England was, by the 6 Geo. 4, c. 16, s. 61, and the 1 & 2 Wm. 4, c. 56, transferred to the assignees; and that, therefore, the estate in Scotland falling under the provisions of the statute, must, as a necessary consequence, be administered and distributed in this country. This being the case, it followed that no process in any other country, which would affect the bankrupt's property according to the law of that country, can be carried on when the estate had become vested in the assignees. By the 73rd section of the Act it is declared, that if any bankrupt, being at the time insolvent, shall have conveyed to his children or any other person any lands or hereditaments, the commissioners shall have power to sell, and the sale shall be valid against the bankrupt, the children, or other person; and those claiming under him. According, therefore, to the rule here laid down, every person having an interest in the property of the bankrupt must submit and must resort to the only tribunal where the estate can be sold. The whole of the suggestion as to the valuable consideration that was given for the bond rests only upon information and belief, which is entirely rebutted by the circumstance of the bankrupt's insolvency at the very time, which is not denied.

Cases cited: Sill v. Worswick (1 H. Bl. 665); Phillips v. Hunter (2 ib. 402); Beckley v. Monday (5 Madd. 297); Selkrig v. Davis (2 Rose, 291); Bunbury v. Bunbury (2 M. & K. 318); Ex parte Pollard (3 Mon. & Ayr. and Mon. & Ch. 239).

Jas. Parker and Colville, for the defendants, con-passed to the assignees, it was their duty to ascertain what were the rights to which the property was subject, and that it was impracticable to ascertain the rights affecting the real estate in Scotland except in the Scotch courts. The cases of Sill v. Worswick and Selkrig v. Davis were neither of them applicable to the present case, as they merely decided that claims upon the personal estate of the bankrupt should not be prosecuted abroad, and that no rights can be obtained after the bankruptcy against the assignees by means of a foreign suit. The present claim, however, was upon the real, and not on the personal estate, and it was a lien upon the property anterior to the bankruptcy against the assignees, and thus it differed from Pollard's case, where the incumbrancer came in under the fiat, and submitted to the jurisdiction of the Court. The question is not merely between the defendants and the assignees, but between the defendants and all persons claiming against the real estate of the bankrupt in Scotland; and if the defendants are restrained from prosecuting their summons of ranking and sale, the other incumbrancers on the real estate can pursue their remedies, and divide the property among themselves, and thus shut out the defendants. They submitted, therefore, that the Court would not interfere by injunction, except for the sake of preserving to a — the benefit of a judgment to which he may be at the hearing.

Bethell, in reply.—The principle is universally admitted that, with regard to the personal estate of the bankrupt, the assignment under the Bankrupt Act has an ubiquitous operation. The assignees are vested with the property, and it is to their forum, therefore, that the concursus of all creditors must be; not that the creditors, by so doing, are bound by the law of that forum; but thither they must resort in the first instance for a decision of their rights. Whatever may be the practice of other countries in this respect, the right of the creditor, generally speaking, who comes to this forum, must be determined by the statute law. The estate of the bankrupt, by force of the statute, vests in the assignees; and all persons claiming to participate in it must resort here, the domicile of the bankrupt, to have their rights determined under the authority of the statute; and the Court will not, therefore, permit a rival suit to proceed in another country in respect to the estate which the statute has vested in the assignees. The proceedings in Scotland are in the nature of a suit for general administration; and whether it extends to all the creditors of the bankrupt, or those only who claim on the Belnageith estate, is immaterial. The defendants have no portion of the estate, but merely seek to establish a charge on it; and, even should they obtain a judgment, the result would not be to withdraw the estate from the jurisdiction of bankruptcy.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—The only difficulty that presents itself to my mind is, to what extent, under such as to give the obligees of the heritable bond the estate of the obligor, it could not be the estate of two persons at one and the same time; but if the only effect of that law were to make the bankrupt's estate liable to pay certain creditors in proportion, the estate is the estate of the bankrupt, subject only to that liability. Were it a question as to whom the estate belongs, that is a question which the Court cannot determine. The commissioners themselves cannot determine it, but it must be decided only by the law of that country having jurisdiction over it. The only doubt in my mind is, whether the real nature of the law of Scotland is to give to creditors of a given character a right to be paid their demand out of the real estate of the bankrupt. Looking at the words of the statute, it seems to me that the estate has passed to the assignees, notwithstanding it was a real estate, and that it vests in them in the same manner that every particle of the personal estate belonged to them before the statute 6 Geo. 4; the effect of the estate would therefore be, to give the administration of the estate to the commissioners under the fiat; but in a case where certain persons became obligees for a bond in Scotland, and there was a contest respecting their rights, that is a point to be determined by the Scotch law in the manner which that law directs; but I think it is a case in which the Court will interfere and grant an injunction.

ROLLS COURT.

Feb. 24, April 17, June 3, 10, 11, July 23 and 31.

DAVENPORT v. STAFFORD.

Insertion of a clause by consent in a decree—Rehearing—Acquiescence.

A suit having been instituted against an executor for the administration of his testator's estate, and being revived, on the death of the executor, against his executors, they by their answer deny assets of their testator; but the decree, as drawn up, being for the usual accounts, payments of balances, &c. "the executors, by counsel, admitting assets for that purpose," a petition of re-hearing, to relieve the petitioners from the admission, was refused, after the decree had been acquiesced in for a long time, and the suit had been subsequently prosecuted by the petitioners so as to make it probable they knew of the admission, though the evidence was clear that no admission was made by counsel at the hearing, and no such admission appeared on the register's minutes in the court, but only on the minutes as drawn up afterwards in the register's office, and stated to be by consent of parties.

Properly, all such additions or alterations should be made by order, on application to the Court, and it is irregular to do otherwise; but convenience requires that the registers themselves should make, and they accordingly do make, if all parties agree, such alterations as their experience tells them the Court would in such cases make; but no register would do so without the consent of all parties, nor so as to be inconsistent with the decree.

In such a case of alteration by introducing the clause respecting admission of assets, if it was done without the consent of all parties, which is not probable, it must have been so done by fraud or accident, much more probably the former, and, under the circumstances, redress can only be had, if at all, by bill, and not on petition of re-hearing.

Edward Manners, the testator in the cause, by his will, made in 1807, gave his property to Ann Stafford for life, with remainder to his ten children, and appointed Ann Stafford his executrix. In 1815, Mrs. Frisby, one of the children, and her husband, instituted a suit against Mrs. Stafford, &c. for the administration of the testator's estate. In 1819, Mr. Frisby died, and in 1820, Mrs. Frisby married Mr. Davenport, who, in 1826, revived the suit which had abated by Mr. Frisby's death, and also the death in 1821, of Arthur Manners, one of the defendants. In 1827, Ann Stafford died, having by her will appointed Edward Manners and Roger Manners (two of the testator's sons), and James Lowe, her executors, of whom the two former proved her will, and thereby became the legal personal representatives of their father also. In 1828, Davenport and wife filed a bill of revivor and supplement against the executors to Mrs. Stafford, for an account of what she and they had received of her testator's estate, and if they did not admit assets, for an account of her own estate. They, by their answer, denied there was enough of assets to pay her specialty debts. In June 1830, the cause was set down for hearing, and the decree was made which is now in question, and which, as drawn up, ordered that what should be found to have come to the hands of Ann Stafford or of her executors, in respect of her testator's estate, should be answered by her executors, they by counsel admitting assets for that purpose. In November 1830, Edward and Roger Manners purchased the plaintiffs', Davenport and wife's, interest in the property, and Mr. Montrion, their solicitor, handed over all papers, &c. to the Messrs. Lowe, the purchasers' solicitors, and Davenport and wife thenceforth ceased to have any thing to do with the suit, which, however was then prosecuted in their name by Edward and Roger Manners; and various steps were taken up to the year 1835, when, by the death of Fursan Manners, the suits once more abated. Mr. and Mrs. Charlesworth and Mr. and Mrs. Calvert, who had been defendants in the previous proceedings, now became active in the management and prosecution of the suits, and various orders were made to revive, all of which, by a series of blunders, were irregular, and the suit was at last properly constituted only by an order of the 8th May, 1843. The admission of assets by the executors now became important, for there were none belonging to Ann Stafford's estate, and it was liable on the account to the payment of several thousands. They accordingly obtained a common order to rehear, and presented a petition of rehearing; and the respondents having moved to discharge the common order so obtained, the petition and motion came on to be heard together.

Teed and Freeling, for the respondents, and in support of the motion, contended that the question of admission could not be tried in the way proposed, for a rehearing is on the pleadings and evidence. The decree having stated that the admission was made, the parties cannot escape from that admission on which the decree is founded. A petition for re-hearing is not the proper mode of trying the question, and the common order ought to be discharged. They cited Moss v. Baldock (1 Phill. 118); Booth v. Creswicke (1 Cr. & Phill. 361); Anon. (1 Ves. Jr. 93); Bradish v. Gee (Ambler, 229); Wood v. Griffith (19 Ves. 550; 1 Meriv. 35-721); Nevison v. Stables (4 Russ. 210); East India Company v. Boddam (13 Ves. 421); Mousley v. Carr (3 My. & K. 205, 291); Deerhurst v. Duke of St. Albans (2 Russ. & Myl. 702); Byfield v. Provis (3 Myl. & Cr. 437); Boys v. Morgan (3 Myl. & Cr. 661); Vowles v. Young (9 Ves. 172); Peachay v. Vintner (1 Rep. C. 252); Lincoln v. Wright (4 Beav. 166, 427).

Roupell and Busk for the representatives of Fursan Manners.

Turner and Renshaw for Walter Manners, contended that the only method of proceeding and the only remedy was by original bill to set the admission aside. They cited Bradish v. Gee (Ambler, 229); Furnival v. Bogle (4 Russ. 142).

Kindersley (with him Roe) for the petitioners, contended that a re-hearing was the proper and only course to pursue. There was no indorsement of any such admission on the briefs of any of the counsel engaged in the cause. [The MASTER of the ROLLS.—The motion is to discharge the order for a re-hearing; there is nothing said against the petition for a re-hearing, and the only question now is, was the order regularly obtained?] It was then arranged that the matter should stand over to allow the petitioners to present another petition of a more precise nature, and putting the matter properly in issue. They accordingly did present another petition praying a re-hearing, and that they might be relieved from the admission of assets contained in the decree, and be heard as if no such allegation were contained therein.

Kindersley and Roe for the petitioners.

Teed (with him Freeling) hoped the petition would be dismissed. It was fifteen years since the decree for an account was made; and in 1834 Mr. Gary, a partner in the firm of Messrs. Lowe, the solicitors for the petitioners, knew of the mistake, if mistake it was, and it is only now they come to have it corrected. There were various steps taken in and about the cause by the petitioners, or their solicitors, which must have drawn their attention to the decree; and in 1833 there was a petition presented which set out the decree and omitted the interpolation, so that they must have known it. An original bill was the proper mode, the thing having been acquiesced in so long. They cited Mitf. Pl. 92, 4th ed.; Mussell v. Morgan (3 Br. C. C. 74); Bennett v. Hamill (2 Sch. & Lef. 566).

Roupell and Busk, for the representatives of Fursan Manners, contended that if there had not been an admission of assets, an account of Mrs. Stafford's estate would have been taken, which had not been done. Interrogatories had been carried into the Master's office by Messrs. Lowe as to the receipts of Ann Stafford and of her executors, &c., and they must therefore have known of the admission.

Turner and Renshaw for Walter Manners, contended that it was now asked to alter the decree on the affidavit of Mr. Gary, which was not right. (Whalley v. Whalley, 3 Bligh 1.) They also insisted that acquiescence and lapse of time precluded any remedy now.

Tillotson for other parties.

Kindersley, in reply, said the briefs of counsel engaged in the cause for several of the parties had not been produced; several of the solicitors also were dead, and the bills of costs were not forthcoming, though they might throw light upon the subject.

On a subsequent day it was stated that the briefs of most of the counsel had been produced, and on none of them was there an indorsement of admission of assets. The bills of costs of the solicitors had also been found, and though, there were charges for attendance in the register's office upon drawing up the decree, that was attempted to be explained, and it was alleged that attendances might be charged and yet no attendance actually have taken place, for it is customary for the clerk making out the bills of costs to a charge for every thing incidental to any particular step he finds to have been taken, whether the service was actually performed or not. As to the register, he of course would not have drawn up the minutes containing the admission of assets without the consent of all parties; and, if such consent was not given, which was not so probable as that it was, there must have been fraud more probably than accident.

The MASTER of the ROLLS, after stating the facts, observed that, on the part of the respondents, it was said that all parties consented, and that they did so was to be inferred from the circumstances; that no relief should be given in the form in which it was asked; that a simple re-hearing would be on the matters at the first hearing, and that it should not be allowed on petition, but should, if at all, be sought by original bill for that purpose. On mature consideration, he (the Master of the Rolls) had thought it right to have the evidence produced and the case gone into. On the evidence, it was clear there was no admission of assets at the hearing; that appeared from the minutes of the register and counsels' briefs. But, before the decree is passed, there are proceedings before the register, and if the parties consent to any addition or alteration not inconsistent with the decree, the register permits it to be made, and delay is thereby avoided. The course is not regular, for strict regularity requires every thing to be done or ordered by the Court; but the pressure of business renders that course inconvenient and impracticable, and therefore the register, with consent of parties, does what, from his experience, he thinks the Court would do, in several cases, and among others, in this of the admission of assets; and in such cases justice requires that parties should be bound by the consent of their solicitors. In cases in which the minutes are agreed upon by the parties, there is less strictness, and great confidence is reposed in the solicitors, and there is certainly an opportunity for fraud; and the whole course of proceedings in this case shews that if the consent of the petitioners was not given, the insertion of the disputed clause was the result of fraud rather than accident. The minutes were drawn up soon after the decree, and on the 6th of August, Messrs. Lowe applied for a copy of them. This shews they were attending to the business, and knew a copy of the minutes might be obtained; they did obtain it, and it contains the clause in question. From that time, Messrs. Lowe knew what the decree, as drawn up, was, for they must have read the minutes; and therefore, if they had not assented, they would not have submitted; they would have waited for no notice, but would have gone to the register. Their quiescence shews they consented. But in the bill of costs, they charged for attendance to settle the minutes; and on the other hand it is said, the charge for attendance is no proof of attendance. Now, that solicitors should charge for what may not be necessary, and yet will not be taxed off, on the ground that other charges are inadequate to remunerate them, is a course of conduct which it is easier to blame than to sanction. The only remedy is to be found by the true mode of remunerating solicitors by the amount of service performed. If Lowe had meetings with the other parties, his attendance on the register may have been unnecessary; but there is no evidence whatever of this. It is said the question is to be determined by probability. In his (the Master of the Rolls') opinion, the probability of consent having been given in the registrar's office was greater than that that it was not; and, on the whole, he was of opinion that there was a consent, and an admission of assets, and that it was binding on the parties. It was clear, however, that if there was fraud or mistake, relief would be given; if the application was made soon, and the evidence was clear, a re-hearing would be sufficient; if, after a lapse of years, it would be unjust to put the parties in the same position as at the original hearing, and a re-hearing would not be sufficient. Again, in case of fraud and mistake, an original bill might be filed for relief, for which, in this case, his lordship was of opinion that the ground, if any, was fraud, not mistake. The petition must be dismissed with costs.

VICE-CHANCELLOR KNIGHT BRUCE'S COURT.

BURNHAM v. BENNETT.

Husband and wife—Chose in action—Reduction into possession.

A married woman, who at the time of her marriage was entitled to money due upon a promissory note to her, and to stock standing in her name, joins with her husband in executing a settlement of the property, and in lieu of the promissory note a bond is given to the trustees, and the stock is transferred into their names. The trusts of the settlement were for the husband and wife, and the children of the marriage. The husband having died in the lifetime of the wife, it was held, that the property had been reduced into possession by him.

By a post-nuptial settlement, dated the 17th of March, 1813, and made between William Stephens and Susanna his wife, of the one part, and two trustees of the other part, after reciting that, at the time of the marriage of Stephens and his wife, she was entitled to 500*l.* secured by the promissory note of John Ward, and to 700*l.* Four per Cent. Bank Annuities; and that it had been agreed that J. Ward should give a bond to the trustees for the 500*l.* and that the stock should be transferred to the same trustees, upon the trusts thereinafter declared; and further reciting that the wife had, with the privity of the husband, so transferred the 700*l.* it was witnessed that it was agreed that the promissory note should be given up and cancelled, and that a bond should be given to the trustees in lieu thereof. And it was declared that the bond was intended to be given, and the 700*l.* stock had been transferred to the trustees upon certain trusts for William Stephens for his life, if he and his wife should so long live together, and after his decease or their separation, for the wife for her life, and after her decease, for William Stephens for his life, and after the decease of the survivor of them, upon trust for the children of the marriage as the wife should appoint, and in default of appointment, for the children equally; and in default of children, for such persons as the wife should by deed or will appoint, and in default of such appointment, for the husband absolutely. The bond was given to the trustees by J. Ward, and the stock was transferred into their names. William Stephens died in 1819. Susanna Stephens made a will in her husband's lifetime, and in 1840 executed a codicil, and subsequently died. Conflicting claims having been made to the money secured by the bond, and to the stock, this suit was instituted. The principal question was, whether the settlement, and the arrangements consequent thereon, constituted a sufficient reduction into possession by the husband to bar the wife's right by survivorship.

Teed and Fooks, for the representatives of the wife, cited Ryland v. Smith (1 Myl. & Cr. 53); Wornbwell v. Larer (2 Sim. 300); Scarren v. Blunt (7 Ves. 294); and Wall v. Tomlinson (16 Ves. 413).

Chandless, for a party in the same interest, cited Holland v. Calhford (2 Vern. 662).

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—The facts of this case are these:—A woman, being the payee of a promissory note, or at least holding a promissory note, and having a legal title to receive the money, and having a legal title to stock, or having stock standing in her name, marries without any settlement being executed. After the marriage, the husband determines on this course: that a settlement of both the promissory note and the stock shall be made, and that the person from whom the money on the note was due should give a bond in lieu of it, and that such bond should be given to certain trustees, the money secured by it to be held upon the trusts of the settlement, and that the stock should be transferred for those trusts. This is done. The bond is given to the trustees. The husband also transfers, or causes to be transferred, the stock into the names of the same trustees: the settlement is executed, and the trustees accept the trust. I am of opinion, from the whole of the facts of this case, the circumstances must be considered as forming one entire transaction; and treating them as forming one transaction, I consider that it is a complete reduction into possession as against the wife's right by survivorship. It is stated that the note has not been destroyed; but I think that circumstance is immaterial. The bond was given in satisfaction of the note, and no action could afterwards be sustained upon the note, because if, in one sense of the term, it was not gone or extinguished by merger, it was gone by satisfaction. The fact, if it be one, that the mere paper is undestroyed, is nothing, if it does not exist as a promissory note. It can hardly be said that the husband, having a right to receive the money and to transfer it into his own name, could not effectually cause the money to be transferred to another person. Such a proposition could scarcely be advanced, and has not been advanced. The mere hand to receive the money is immaterial,—the mere transfer is immaterial. I quite agree that a woman having a chose in action, the mere legal title being changed, that does not affect her; as, for instance, if in the case of an agreement for a settlement, the husband had had in his mind an uncertain and floating idea of making a settlement, or intending at some time or other to make a settlement, and with this view had caused the debtor to give the bond to A B and C D, and before any trust was declared, had died, the wife's right by survivorship would not be defeated, because only the legal title, and not the beneficial ownership, had been affected, and possibly a case of difficulty might have arisen, such as that mentioned by Mr. Fooks. For instance, if the husband had changed the legal title without changing the beneficial ownership, nothing changed, nothing affected but the legal title; and then, by a totally distinct transaction, had made a declaration of trust, there being a plain, sensible chasm between the two transactions, then the wife's title would not be affected. But that is not this case. Here the whole of the circumstances form one certain, single, and complete and entire transaction. The husband might have released the debt, but he did not; he determined to have a bond in lieu of the promissory note, and he had it. All this is done, and there is a declaration of trust, and I am of opinion that it is a complete, binding, and effectual transaction, as much so as if he had received the money himself. With the case and judgment of Scawen v. Blunt I entirely agree. With the mode in which the cases of Wall v. Tomlinson and Ryland v. Smith were decided, I also agree; whether with every thing reported to be said by the Court on either occasion I need not say; with the substantial result I agree. I agree with the judgment as far as I understand those cases. Property had been made to change hands with a view to an intended settlement; and the circumstances which happened were such that, if the settlement is treated as effectual, the wife was entitled, if not, there was no settlement—no trust, and nothing but the legal title changed; and therefore, in that view, the wife was entitled. With reference to Wombwell v. Lacer, it is not necessary to express any opinion; I decide this case as if Wombwell v. Lacer had never existed.

Schomberg and Sidebotham, for other parties, were not heard upon this point.

ROSS v. ROSS.

Will—Construction.

A testator gave to his three nieces 3,000*l. stock, in equal shares, under the same conditions and restrictions as were mentioned respecting the several bequests thereinafter mentioned to them respectively given. He then gave to trustees* 12,000*l. stock, upon trust as to third parts, for the three nieces respectively and their respective children; and it was held that the* 3,000*l. was subject to the same limitations as the* 12,000*l.*

Thomas Gally, by his will dated in 1807, gave to his nephew, George Ross, 3,000*l.* Three per Cent. Consols, and also, from and after the death of the testator's sister, 1,000*l.* part of his stock of Four per Cents; and in case of his death in the testator's lifetime, without lawful issue, the two sums were to be equally divided amongst the testator's three nieces, "under the same conditions and restrictions as were thereinafter mentioned respecting the several bequests thereinafter mentioned to them respectively given." After a further bequest to George Ross, the testator gave to trustees 12,000*l.* Three per Cent. Consols, upon trust to pay one-third of the dividends for the benefit of the testator's niece Christian Ross, for her life, for her separate use, and not to be subject to the control of her then present or any after-taken husband; and after her decease, upon trust as to 4,000*l.* one-third part of the said 12,000*l.* for the benefit of the child and children of the said Christian Ross, living at the time of her decease, and the issue, if any, then living of such of her children as might have died in her lifetime. The testator then declared trusts to the same effect of the other two third parts of the 12,000*l.* in favour of his other nieces, and their respective children and issue. It was then provided by the will, that, on the death of one niece without leaving any child or issue of a child surviving, the dividends of her one-third should be paid to the other nieces for their lives equally; and that if two of the nieces should die without leaving any child or issue of a child surviving, the dividends of their respective thirds should be paid to the other niece during her life; and it was declared that such accruing or surviving dividends should be paid to such surviving nieces or niece during their or her lives or life, for their or her separate use, &c. as directed respecting their original shares or share of the dividends of the 12,000*l.* It was further provided, that, in the event of the death of all the nieces without leaving a child or issue of a child surviving, the fund should become part of the testator's residuary estate. The testator appointed the same persons he had named as trustees, to be executors, and died in 1810. George Ross died in the lifetime of the testator, but the three nieces survived. The trustees paid the dividends on the 3,000*l.* and the 12,000*l.* equally among the three nieces until the death of one leaving children, when they transferred 1,000*l.* part of the 3,000*l.* and one-third of the 12,000*l.* to the children of the deceased niece; and on the death of the second niece leaving children, similar sums of 1,000*l.* and 4,000*l.* were transferred to such children. Christian Ross, the surviving niece, then claimed to be entitled absolutely to the remaining part of the 3,000*l.* and, as the administrator of the surviving executor of the testator, claimed to have the sum for her own benefit. This bill was filed by one of her children against her, and prayed a declaration that the 1,000*l.* the third of the 3,000*l.* was subject to the same trusts as the third of the 12,000*l.* &c. The bill was demurred to.

Wigram and Toller, for the demurrer.

Russell and Montague, for the bill.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—If the will, in bequeathing the 3,000*l.* had stopped at the words "be equally divided amongst my three nieces hereinafter named," it would have been equivalent to the gift of a fee-simple, and out of that no limitation could have been made. The will, however, proceeds—"under the same conditions and restrictions as are hereinafter mentioned, respecting the several bequests hereinafter mentioned to them respectively given." The words "conditions and restrictions" place the former gift under the same limitations as are declared of the 12,000*l.* The word "bequests" means the whole bequest of the absolute interest, and that absolute interest in the 12,000*l.* is subject not only to the conditions and restrictions, but to the limitations mentioned in the will, which equally apply, therefore, to the 3,000*l.* It is impossible to know how any difference in the language of the parts of the will occurred; but it seems probable that the contingency occurred to the testator's mind after the will was prepared, and additional words were then inserted. However this may be, I am of opinion that the 1,000*l.* is subject to all the same provisions as relate to the 4,000*l.* one-third of the 12,000*l.* and that Mrs. Ross is not absolutely entitled. The demurrer must be overruled.

July 21 and 23.

DEAN v. HICKINBOTTOM.

Practice—Amendment—Construction of 13*th order of* 3*rd of April*, 1828.

The answer mentioned in the 13*th order of April*, 1828, as amended by the order of November, 1831, means the answer to an original bill and not to an amended bill; and the six weeks mentioned in the above order, to be counted from the time of the last answer to the original bill, shall be deemed sufficient.

When the time limited by the 13*th order above mentioned for amending a bill has expired, it is in the discretion of the Court to allow further amendment or not. When such an application is made, it should be supported by an affidavit of the nature directed by that order.*

This was a motion for leave to re-amend a bill upon affidavit of materiality (in the form directed by the 13th order of April 1828, as amended by the orders of November 1831), after six weeks had expired from the time the answer to the original bill had been deemed sufficient, but within six weeks from the time the answer to the amended bill would be deemed sufficient.

The facts were as follows.—The original bill was filed on the 9th of June, 1843; the answer to that was filed in June 1844; an order to amend was obtained as of course, and the bill was amended on the 27th of January, 1845. The first answer to the amended bill was filed on the 24th of April, 1845, and two subsequent answers were filed on the 5th and 8th of May, 1845. The words of the 13th order above referred to are, "that after an answer has been filed, the plaintiff shall be at liberty, before filing a replication, to obtain, upon motion or petition, without notice, one order for leave to amend the bill; but no further leave to amend shall be granted after an answer and before replication, unless the Court shall be satisfied by affidavit that the draft of the intended amendments has been settled, approved, and signed by counsel, and that such amendments are not intended to be made for the purpose of delay or vexation, but because the same are considered to be material to the case of the plaintiff; such affidavit to be made by the plaintiff, or one of the plaintiffs, where there is more than one, and his or their solicitor, or by such solicitor alone, in case the plaintiff or plaintiffs, from being abroad or otherwise, shall be unable to join therein; but no order to amend shall be made after answer and before repli[illegible] either without notice or upon affidavit, in manner hereinbefore mentioned, unless such order be obtained within six weeks after the answer, if there be only one defendant, or after the last of the answers, if there be two or more defendants, is to be deemed sufficient.

Campbell, for the motion, contended that the answer referred to in the order meant the last answer in an amended bill, where the bill had been amended.

Shapter, contrà, argued that the order referred to the last answer to the original bill only, and the six weeks having long expired since the first answer was deemed sufficient, this motion could not be granted; and even though the Court should be of opinion against such a construction of the order, the motion was irregular, for the six weeks from the last answer to the amended bill had not expired, and this, being a special motion, ought to have been made before the Master and not the Court.

The cases cited were: Wimburn and Cranburn Union v. Masson (8 Jurist, 370); Wilson v. Wilson (8 Jurist, 328); Bartalotzi v. Johnstone (2 Hare, 632); Hadlesaye v. Nevill (4 Beavan, 28); Attorney-General v. Nethercote (2 Mylne & Craig, 604); Wharton v. Swan (2 Mylne & Keen, 262); Evans v. Hughes (5 Sim. 666); Phillips v. Gooding (1 Hare, 40).

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—This is an application to amend after the time, in my view of the order, has expired; the bill was filed on the 9th of June, 1843; the answer was not put in until June 1844; the defendant therefore took a year to answer that which was merely an account of the testator's estate; the plaintiff had after that an order to amend, and in six months the bill was amended; the last answer to the amended bill was put in on the 9th of May, and consequently could not be deemed sufficient until the 3rd of July, being within the six weeks required by the order; one question arises upon the construction to be put upon the word "answer" used in the order; another, whether, under the facts of this case, the plaintiff is entitled to have leave to amend, and if so, whether this application should be made to the Court or the Master, on the authority of The Attorney-General v. Netherrote, which Lord Langdale afterwards followed in Hadlesaye v. Neville, and my own decision in Bartalotzi v. Johnstone. I consider that the answer mentioned in the 13th order is an answer to the original bill; for to construe it as applying to the answer to an amended bill would be making the order a nullity, as in that case the plaintiff, by omitting necessary parties to his bill in the first instance, or by the colourable addition of a friendly party, might acquire a right to amend over and over again, and thus bring back the old practice which it was the object of this order to correct. If this motion to amend be proper, there is no impropriety in the present application; it may not in strictness be right, but it is in the discretion of the Court; and if it did not appear from the beginning the plaintiff had the same power he had now, I should be very reluctant to allow him to amend. In this case, however, it appears no injustice can be done to the parties by giving leave to amend; it will merely cause a little delay, and the subject matter of this suit is not of that nature that time is very material. You may, therefore take leave to amend within a week. I have decided against two cases, though I have three in my favour; I hope, however, the parties will appeal to the Lord Chancellor against my decision, to have the point finally settled, for, in a matter of every day's practice, the point should not be left in doubt from conflicting decisions.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

Wednesday, May 14.

SITTINGS AFTER EASTER TERM.

KYN[illegible]TON v. CROUCH.

A foreman of a business, in the absence of his employer, paid certain wages and trade and household expenses out of the proceeds of the business, in accordance with his usual duty and authority: before these payments were made, the employer had, unknown to the foreman, committed an act of bankruptcy: Held, that these payments were not protected, and that the money could be recovered from the foreman in an action for money had and received.

This was a rule obtained by Crowder, Q. C. for a new trial, or to reduce the damages.

Cockburn, Q. C. and Greenwood now showed cause against the rule, citing Bearson v. Graham (6 A. & E. 8), and Harwood v. Bartlett (6 Bing. N. C.)

and distinguishing Coles v. Wright (4 Taunt. 198), and Vernon v. Hanley (2 Term Rep. 113).

Crowder, Q.C. was heard in support of his rule, but the facts of the case and the arguments are so fully set out in the judgment, that it is not necessary to give them here. In the course of his argument, he cited Gales v. Robins (2 Comp. 182); Tape v. Hockin (7 B. & C. 101); and Coles v. Wright (4 Taunt. 198). Cur. adv. vult.

JUDGMENT.

PARKE, B. now delivered the judgment of the Court.—This case was argued before my brothers Alderson, Rolfe, Platt, and myself, at the sittings after Easter Term, and we agree with my brother Patteson in holding that the plaintiff was entitled to recover; and we are of opinion that the rule which has been obtained to enter a nonsuit or reduce the damages must be discharged. The action was brought by the plaintiff, as assignee of one Bates, the bankrupt, for money had and received to their use. The pleas were, Never indebted, and a set-off for work and labour done by the defendant for the plaintiff, money lent, and an account stated. The assignee sought to recover 153*l.* 13*s.* received by the defendant after the 23rd of October, 1843, on which day Bates committed an act of bankruptcy, and a fiat was issued on the 14th of November in the same year. The bankrupt was a tradesman carrying on business at Bristol, and the defendant was his foreman, and attended in his shop and managed his business for him, and after the bankrupt had left home, which was the act of bankruptcy, the defendant received in the shop various sums of money, some for shop-goods sold by him after the act of bankruptcy, the rest from debtors to the bankrupt, who paid the amount of their respective debts to him. The defendant made various payments to persons in the course of carrying on the business of the bankrupt during his absence; some to creditors and some for the expense of housekeeping, and the smaller sums he retained for wages due to himself, and those payments altogether are 153*l.* 13*s.* received by him; a part of these payments, amounting to 25*l.* plaintiff paid after the defendant had notice of the act of bankruptcy, namely, on the 9th of November. The jury found that all were bonâ fide made, and upon these facts the learned judge thought the defendant liable to the assignees for all the money received by him after the act of bankruptcy, and was not entitled to take credit for any of the payments; and we are all of the same opinion. The sums received by the defendant after the bankruptcy for the sale of the goods by him, and those received from debtors, stand on the same footing; as to the former, the goods were the property of the assignees by relation, for we must still think the relation did exist, although it is remarkable that the legislature, by the 6 Geo. 4, s. 16, repealed the statute 13 Eliz. c. 7, on which the relation depended, and without expressly re-enacting its provision. The defendant, by selling the goods, was, primâ facie, guilty of a conversion, and was liable in an action of trover, although he was merely a servant of the bankrupt; and if liable in trover, the assignees may sue him for money had and received, instead of that form of action; and by so doing they would only sue for the net proceeds of the value of the goods, subject to the consequence of treating the demand as a debt, or in the light of a set-off, where there is a liquidated cross demand, but no more. They do not thereby ratify and confirm any subsequent application of the proceeds by the defendant, and the implied authority previously given by the bankrupt was determined by the act of bankruptcy, and does not bind the assignees. A set-off was pleaded, but was not proved; but as to this part of the demand, the plaintiff was certainly entitled to recover on the present pleadings, if the defendant was liable in trover. But if a title had vested in the purchaser by a debt, he would have been protected by the provision of the statute 6 Geo. 4, c. 16, 3 & 4 Vict. c. 22, as bonâ fide purchaser, so that the action of trover could not have been maintained against him; and it seems to follow, the defendant would not have been liable in a like action of trover, for an act that vested a valid title in another could not well be termed a conversion. It was not left to the jury, in the present case, whether a purchaser of the goods had notice of the act of bankruptcy, and consequently whether the sale to him was valid or not. Believing that it was valid, an action of trover could not have been supported against him, nor, consequently, against the defendant; still we think an action for money had and received would lie, because the moment the money was received, it was money by relation received for the assignees by the defendant at the time it was received, but subsequently misapplied by the defendant; so that, though the money was not in his hands at the time of the appointment of the assignees, he would still be liable in that form of action. At the time, therefore, the defendant was indebted for money had and received, and whether he was ever indebted, was the only question on these proceedings. The claim for the residue of the money, namely, that received from the debtors of the bankrupt, is differently situated, and requires full consideration. If the debts due from the debtor at the time of the act of bankruptcy, which were themselves assigned by the operation of the Bankrupt Act to the plaintiff, were not discharged by payment made to the bankrupt or his servant, so that the debtors would still be liable to the assignees, even if the moneys paid by the debtors were paid under such circumstances as that they would be still treated as their own, and be recovered back from the defendant (and such circumstance was very likely to occur) there would be a great difficulty in holding the plaintiff can recover the amount against the defendant as money had and received to their use as assignees; and if a payment to the defendant discharges the debts which originally were the debtors', they are said to be such as, being received on account of the bankrupt after the act of bankruptcy, would pass to the assignees, for the assignment operates on all property existing at the time of the act of bankruptcy, and all subsequent property, just as if a fresh assignment was made at the time, and such portion of the property was so appropriated. If the payment vested the money in the bankrupt, although the debt was not discharged, that consequence would follow on referring to the facts in question. If no payment discharged the debt, no doubt the payment would not have been made if the debtors had notice of the act of bankruptcy, and if they had not, the money paid vested in the bankrupt; and in either case the plaintiff was entitled to recover the amount of property acquired after the act of bankruptcy, which belongs, by virtue of the assignment, to the assignees, and which, therefore, when received, was money received to their use. We think, therefore, an action for money had and received to the use of the assignees will lie in this case. Whether the defendant could not have protected himself by a plea as to part of the money received, or whether for the sale of goods or payment of goods, having been paid in the payment of disbursements without notice of the act of bankruptcy, so being entitled to the protection of the statute 6 Geo. 4, c. 16, 4 & 5 Vic. c. 29, is a different question, on which it is unnecessary to give an opinion, as it must not be inferred the defendant would have been liable to refund the whole of the money received, if he had pleaded so as to avail himself of the protection which the statute gives. On the part of the defendant, it was contended he was not liable, because he was merely the means of carrying the money from the hand of one person to another messenger or receiver, and it fell within the case of Coles v. Wright (4 Taunt. 198), which was also adopted in Tape v. Hockin (7 B. & C. 101). It is clear that that principle is wholly inapplicable to the case of shop-goods sold, and the defendant was a wrongdoer by relation. We think that also the defendant cannot be considered as a mere channel of conveyance with respect to the moneys received for the goods which are paid by the debtors. They were payments to him as agent of the bankrupt; but they were general payments, without any direction, express or implied, to pay them over to his master. The moment the money got into the hands of the defendant, the debtor was discharged, and he had no interest in any subsequent application of it, and therefore he could not be considered as having made it upon a special trust or direction to pay the money. As between the debtor and the bankrupt, it was a payment to the latter; but as between the assignees, who represent the bankrupt, and the defendant, it was money paid to him as money had and received to their use, and the defendant cannot plead specially that he has paid it to the bankrupt without notice of the bankruptcy, or in any other way so as to avail himself of the protection of the statute.

COMMISSIONERS' COURTS.

(Before Mr. Commissioner FONBLANQUE.)

Monday, Aug. 18.

BUCHANAN v. FORSTER.

Where a defendant, against whom a judgment had been obtained for a sum of money under 20l. had been taken in execution on such judgment previous to the passing of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, but had been subsequently discharged out of custody by order of a judge under that Act.

Held, that the imprisonment under such execution was a satisfaction of the debt, and that the defendant could not be proceeded against under the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 127, upon such judgment.

A summons had been issued in this case under the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 127, in the form given in that Act, requiring the defendant to appear before a commissioner of the Court of Bankruptcy this day, to answer such questions as should be put to him touching the not having paid to the plaintiff the amount recovered in a certain judgment against him. The plaintiff having proved the judgment recovered, by an office copy of the judgment roll, and having stated that the defendant had been taken in execution upon the judgment before the passing of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96; but had been subsequently discharged, by order of a judge, under the 58th section of the last mentioned Act, was about to examine the defendant as to the non-payment of the said debt, when

His HONOUR said, you must first shew that the debt was not extinguished by the imprisonment.

Plaintiff.—The 58th section of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, the clause under which the defendant was discharged out of custody, provides that, notwithstanding such discharge, the judgment shall remain in full force.

His HONOUR.—The well-known doctrine of law is, that imprisonment, if only for a day, satisfies the debt. It is similar to a certificate in bankruptcy. The words of the 58th section of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, are, that "the judgment shall nevertheless remain and continue in full force to the intent and purpose, that the creditor may have judgment and execution against the goods of the debtor." The legislature, by providing that the judgment shall remain good for the particular purpose mentioned in the above clause, have clearly recognized the general doctrine I have before mentioned. The third section of the Act under which this summons was issued also recognizes the same doctrine, otherwise where was the use of the enactment contained in that clause, that "no imprisonment under that Act should operate as a satisfaction or extinguishment of any debt or demand." Summons dismissed.

BUCHANAN v. SMITH.

Jurisdiction of the Court.

Where a defendant who had been summoned under the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 127, consented to waive the formal proof of the judgment recovered against him. The plaintiff not being prepared to prove it, the Court refused to act on such consent.

This defendant appeared upon a summons issued under the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 127. The plaintiff not being prepared with an office copy of the judgment against the defendant, but only with the incipitur of the judgment, the defendant consented to waive the production of an office copy, and to admit the judgment.

His HONOUR.—The jurisdiction of this court, in these cases depends upon the fact of a judgment having actually been obtained out of a court of competent jurisdiction. Possibly the defendant's consent might be an answer to any objection raised by him hereafter to the jurisdiction of this court; but, as one consequence of such consent may be that I may be called upon hereafter to deprive the defendant of his liberty, I shall decline to act upon such consent.

ROBERTS v. JENKINS.

Practice.

Where a defendant has been summoned under the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 127, and does not appear, the plaintiff must be prepared with an affidavit of service.

Where a plaintiff is not prepared with all his evidence in support of his summons when it is called on, the case will be struck out of the list.

If the defendant does not appear the Court will adjudicate in his absence.

It is not sufficient for the plaintiff or defendant to appear at the hearing of the summons by attorney, but they must both be present in person.

This defendant had been summoned under the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 127. When the case was called on,

Mr. Duncan said he was instructed by the attorney of the defendant (who had accidentally heard that a summons had been issued against the defendant), to oppose the hearing of the summons. The defendant had not been served with a copy of the summons and knew nothing of it. He was not now present. The plaintiff was not in court, but had instructed an attorney to appear for him, who stated that the summons had been placed in the hands of the messenger of the Court for service, and the fact of the service could be ascertained from him.

His HONOUR.—I shall not call the messenger to prove the service, you should have been prepared with an affidavit of service. Let it be understood when these cases are called on, if the plaintiff is not ready with all the evidence necessary to support his summons, the case will be struck out of the paper. If the plaintiff is prepared and the defendant is not here, I shall adjudicate in his absence. I should further remark, that it is necessary that the plaintiff as well as the defendant should be present in person at the hearing, as the Act directs that they are both to be examined touching the judgment, if required.

Order for payment of judgment debt by instalments, under the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 127.

This was a summons issued by one of the commissioners of the Court of Bankruptcy, under the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 127, founded upon a judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, for a sum less than 20*l.*

An office copy of the judgment having been put in, the defendant, who was a journeyman tailor, was examined. The debt for which the judgment had been signed amounted to 9*l.* 12*s.* and the costs to 5*l.* 14*s.* It appeared that when the defendant was in full work he was able to earn 1*l.* 10*s.* per week.

HIS HONOUR.—The defendant must pay 1*l.* per month, until the debts and costs are paid.

Order accordingly.

JONES v. KEAN.

Evidence of judgment—Adjournment.

The entry of an incipitur of the judgment on the judgment paper and on the roll is not sufficient evidence under the 8th and 9th Vict. cap. 127, of a judgment recovered.

Quære, has the Court any power to adjourn the hearing of a summons issued under the before-mentioned Act, the plaintiff not being prepared with his evidence in support of the summons?

Defendant had been summoned to appear in the Court of Bankruptcy this day, under the 8 & 9 Vict. cap. 127, to be examined touching a judgment recovered against him at the suit of the plaintiff.

Hughes for the plaintiff.—In order to prove the judgment recovered, put in the judgment roll, with the incipitur of the proceedings entered thereon, and also the judgment paper, with a like entry thereon, sealed with the seal of the Court, and with the Master's allocatur written in the margin.

HIS HONOUR. This is not sufficient evidence for me that a judgment has been signed. It shews me nothing of the proceedings; how am I to tell from this that judgment has been signed.

Hughes.—The Master's allocatur on the judgment paper shews that the judgment has been signed. It also shews the amount of the debt and the taxed costs. These documents in the state they are now in, are all that is required to enable the plaintiff to issue execution. Upon producing these documents to the proper officer of the court, he is satisfied that the judgment has been signed, and thereupon issues the writ of execution; in point of fact, he has issued a writ of execution upon these very documents.

HIS HONOUR, having consulted with Mr. Commissioner Fane on the subject, said:—I see no reason to alter my opinion that the documents produced are not sufficient to prove the judgment, but that the only proper method of proving it under this Act is by an office copy of the judgment roll. In bankruptcy the practice is otherwise; but there, the Court usually inquires into the consideration for the judgment, and the consequences of an error in such case is not so serious as it may be under this Act. I cannot make an order upon such loose evidence. Such evidence may be sufficient to justify an officer of the same court in which the judgment is signed to issue execution. The practice of the superior courts may justify such a proceeding; but if I make an order on the defendant and he disobeys it, I may be called upon hereafter to commit him to prison for disobedience of my order, and it may then be necessary to set out the judgment in the warrant of committal; and how can this be done without a copy of the judgment?

Hughes then applied to have the summons adjourned, to give the plaintiff time to obtain an office copy of the judgment.

HIS HONOUR. I do not know that I have any power to adjourn the summons, unless it be under the general power which all Courts have of adjourning their sittings; but I am not sure that doctrine will apply in this case.

Note.—There being twelve other summonses under similar circumstances, and these being the first under the recent Act of Parliament, it was arranged, at the suggestion of the registrar of the court, that fresh summonses should be issued in all the cases without any further charge.

NORFOLK SPRING CIRCUIT.

REG. v. BRETT and OTHERS.

Principal and receiver—Evidence.

A robbery having been committed at H. on Tuesday, on the following Thursday the prisoner was found in possession of some of the stolen property at W. forty miles off. When taken into custody he said that he got drunk in company with the party charged as principal on the night before, and that he found the cheque when going to bed.—Held, that the possession of the cheque and the prisoner's statement would not support a charge of feloniously receiving it, as the latter ought to be taken as a whole, and as such would be evidence rather of a larceny than of felonious receiving.

The indictment charged that Bridget Brett feloniously stole a cheque for ten guineas, and some notes; that William Brett received the same knowing them to have been so stolen, and that William Ralph received the cheque, knowing the same to have been stolen.

It appeared in evidence that Bridget Brett having stolen the property mentioned in the indictment at Huntingdon, immediately went to William Brett, her father, at Godmanchester, and that they both went into a field, where they broke open the box containing the stolen property. Leaving the box behind them, the two prisoners went with Mrs. Brett to St. Ives, and thence to Wisbeach, where they fell in with the third prisoner, Ralph, at a lodging-house. On that night the whole party got drunk, and a quarrel ensued between William Brett and Ralph. On the following day Ralph tendered the stolen cheque to a banker, who refused to change it, and ultimately caused the apprehension of Ralph. On his person was found a letter addressed to Mrs. Brett at Huntingdon, bearing the postmark of Boston; and there, after search, the two Bretts were found in possession of the rest of the missing property. When informed that Ralph had been taken up in consequence of his presenting the cheque, Wm. Brett avowed that he could only have obtained it by robbing him or his wife on the night at Wisbeach, when they were all drunk. When before the magistrate, Ralph made a statement, to the effect that he met the Bretts by accident at Wisbeach, and that after drinking some time they had all quarrelled; that all he knew of the cheque was, that he picked it up in the room after the Bretts had gone to bed, and that not knowing whose it was, he had tried to change it, and had afterwards burnt it.

Gunning, for the prosecution, proved these facts, and put in the statement of Ralph, and thereupon,

Wells, for the prisoner Ralph, objected that there was no case to go to a jury against him on this indictment.

PARKE, B.—That is so. He is indicted here for feloniously receiving a cheque, well knowing it to have been stolen, and the only evidence against him is the possession of the cheque and his own statement. Now the recent possession of a stolen article would, under ordinary circumstances, be strong evidence of a man's being the principal thief; but that must be regulated by other circumstances in the case. Here the prisoner appears to have got possession of this cheque at a place forty miles distant from the scene of the robbery, which shews that he could not be the principal thief. What then is the case against him as a receiver? Nothing but his own statement, and that being used by the prosecution, must be taken as a whole. He there says, that he found it, not that he received it from any one under circumstances which ought to have induced any reasonable man to believe it to have been stolen. There is, moreover, nothing in the case to contradict this statement, while the observation by Brett, that if he had got the cheque, he stole it from him or his wife, corroborates the story to a certain extent. Altogether, therefore, I do not think there is any evidence here of a felonious receipt. If the case amounts to any thing, it shews a larceny to have been committed, which is an improbable case. There is, however, another view of the evidence, which would make it a felonious act in Ralph to appropriate this cheque at Wisbeach, if found by him under certain circumstances; but that is not the offence charged here against him, and he must be acquitted accordingly.

The two other prisoners were therefore convicted and sentenced, and Ralph acquitted.

NISI PRIUS COURT.

(Before Mr. Baron PARKE.)

FLETCHER v. CALTHORPE and ANOTHER.

Trespass—Justices—Illegal warrant—Special damages—Costs of habeas corpus.

Where a party has been convicted summarily by justices under 9 Geo. 4, c. 69, and committed to prison, under an illegal warrant, he is entitled to recover the costs of procuring his discharge by writ of habeas corpus as special damage in an action of trespass against such justices.

Where a party has been illegally imprisoned, he is entitled to recover as damages all costs reasonably necessary to reinstate him in his status quo ante bellum. Where, therefore, he obtains his discharge under a writ of habeas corpus in London, he can recover the costs of returning home.

Where there has been judgment for the plaintiff on a demurrer, and the cause goes down to assizes to try issues in fact, and also to assess the damages on the issue in law, the pleadings whereon the issue in law arose may be referred to, but not in establishing the facts there set forth.

Trespass for an assault and false imprisonment.

The declaration complained that the defendants, on the 26th of October, 1843, with force and arms, assaulted the said plaintiff at Chippenham, in the county of Cambridge, and there apprehended, seized, and laid hold of him, and forced and compelled him to go from Chippenham aforesaid, to a gaol situate and being in the parish of Chesterton, in the county of Cambridge, and unlawfully imprisoned, and kept and detained him in prison in the said gaol for a long space of time, to wit, from thence until a certain day, to wit, the 21st day of November, in the year aforesaid. And by means of the said plaintiff being imprisoned and kept and detained in the said gaol as aforesaid, and in order to procure his release and discharge from imprisonment in the said gaol, the said plaintiff was forced and obliged to, and necessarily did, to wit, on the 15th day of November in the year aforesaid, cause and procure to be issued a certain writ of habeas corpus, and did also afterwards, to wit, on the 21st day of November in the year aforesaid, cause and procure himself to be, and be accordingly was, carried and conveyed in custody under and by virtue of the said writ of habeas corpus, from the said gaol, to a certain other gaol situate and being in the county of Surrey, and commonly called Horsemonger-lane gaol, and afterwards, to wit, on the 22nd day of November, in the year aforesaid, and from and out of the last-mentioned gaol, to Westminster, in the county of Middlesex, when and where the said plaintiff was, by the court of our Lady the now Queen, before the Queen herself, discharged from the said imprisonment. And by means of the premises the said plaintiff was not only greatly bruised, wounded, and hurt, and whilst he was imprisoned as aforesaid was prevented from earning moneys to a large amount, to wit, 50*l.* which but for the premises he might and would have earned and become entitled to, but also by means of the premises the said plaintiff was forced and obliged to and necessarily did become subject and liable to pay divers sums of money, together amounting to a large sum of money, to wit, 100*l.* for, in, about, and relative to causing and procuring the said writ of habeas corpus to be issued as aforesaid, and causing and procuring himself to be carried and conveyed in custody under and by virtue of the said writ of habeas corpus as aforesaid, and causing himself to be discharged from imprisonment as aforesaid, and otherwise in, about, and relative to procuring and obtaining his release and discharge from the said imprisonment. And by means of the premises the said plaintiff has been and is otherwise greatly injured; and other wrongs to the said plaintiff the said defendants did, against the peace of our said Lady the Queen, and to the damage of the plaintiff of 1,000*l.*

Pleas.—1st. That the plaintiff was guilty of an offence against the provisions of a certain Act of Parliament made and passed in the 9 Geo. 4, c. 69, entitled, "An Act for the more effectual Prevention of Persons going armed by night for the Destruction of Game," and that the defendants, being justices of Cambridgeshire, the plaintiff was charged therewith, on oath before them, and the said offence being duly proved before them on oath, he was convicted thereof, and sentenced to three calendar months' imprisonment. That afterwards the defendants, as such justices, in pursuance of the said conviction of the said plaintiff of his said offence, made and issued under their hands and seals a certain warrant of commitment, under and by virtue of which the plaintiff was taken into custody and committed to prison.—Verification.

2nd. Tender of 25*l.* by way of amends.

The plaintiff demurred to the 1st plea, and on argument the Court of Queen's Bench gave judgment for the demurrer. Issue being taken on the sufficiency of the amends pleaded, secondly, the case now come down for trial, the jury being summoned as well to assess the damages sustained by the plaintiff on the issue in law, as to try the second issue in fact.

Gunning and O'Malley, for the plaintiff, proved that he was taken to the Castle at Cambridge, by virtue of the defendants' warrant, on the 26th November, 1843, and there confined and kept to hard labour for seventeen days, at the expiration of which time he was taken to London, and discharged by Mr. Justice Patteson on a writ of habeas corpus, on the ground that the warrant omitted to state a date. It further appeared that a bill of costs was created by this proceeding to the amount of 33*l.* 13s. 6d.; and that, inter alia, there was a charge therein for the cost of serving the original prosecutor with a copy of the writ of habeas corpus, and another of 1*l.* for cash advanced in London to the plaintiff for coach-hire and conveyance home. The plaintiff had not paid this bill of costs, nor did it appear that any signed bill had been delivered to him by his attorney. At the close of the plaintiff's case,

Byles, Serjt. (Worlledge was with him) objected that the plaintiff could not include in his claim for damages the bill of costs. There was special damage laid in the declaration indeed, and it included the costs and expenses of the plaintiff in and about obtaining his discharge; but he ought to have given evidence to shew that he was legally bound to pay what he claimed. He might be morally bound to pay these costs to his attorney, but he was not legally so until a signed bill had been delivered. Even, however, if he should be considered to be legally bound to pay them at some time, then it is submitted that the plaintiff cannot recover them at all from the defendants. They are not so for the necessary consequence of the plaintiff's imprisonment by the defendants as to render the latter liable to him for them. It was held in Harman v. Tappenden (3 Esp. 278), that where a party has been removed from being a member of a corporation, and has been restored by mandamus, that he could not maintain an action for damages against the members of the corporation who removed him by an act done in their corporate capacity, nor recover the costs of the mandamus which he had claimed as special damage. There Lord Kenyon nonsuited the plaintiff, and as to the last point said, "he had no doubt" that as the plaintiff was not liable to the costs of the man- damus, so he was not entitled to them in an action. Neither was this plaintiff liable to the costs on the habeas corpus; and that being so, he ought not to be allowed to recover them in this form of proceeding.

Gunning, contrà.—As to the right to recover these costs at all as special damage, the case cited against it is no authority, for Lord Kenyon's opinion proceeded on a particular statute (9 Anne, c. 20), which had given costs in mandamus only in one case, namely, where there was a traverse.

Parke, B.—The case in Espinasse was decided on the question whether the defendants were liable personally for an act done in their corporate capacity; but I confess it seems to me reasonable that a person situated as the plaintiff is, through the illegal conduct of another, should recover the costs incurred by him in seeking redress from that illegality. As to the liability of the plaintiff to recover the bill of costs, it is clearly a debt contracted by him with his attorney, and though no signed bill has yet been delivered, I think that as he is or may be made liable to pay it, he may recover it as special damage in this action.

Byles, Serjt. then addressed the jury on the merits, and contended that, on the authority of Gregory v. The Duke of Brunswick (1 C. & K. 30), he was at liberty to recur to the pleadings connected with the demurrer in support of his assertion that the plaintiff came before the jury as a "convicted poacher." The defendants had pleaded the fact, and the information and conviction, in a plea to which the plaintiff had thought fit to demur, and by so doing he had admitted those facts. Lord Chief Justice Tindal, in the case just quoted, had given his sanction to this course of argument.

Parke, B.—The jury being sworn to try the issue in fact as well as to inquire what damages have been sustained by the plaintiff on the issue in law, on which he has had the judgment of the Court, those pleadings are open to the defendants in argument here; but though a demurrer admits facts demurred to, that is only in so far as the same are well pleaded. I cannot prevent my brother Byles from referring to the facts pleaded; but he is not at liberty to assume them to be true, as if proved in the case. That is no more open to him than it is to the plaintiff to assert that the judgment on the demurrer has proved him to be an innocent man. All that Gregory v. The Duke of Brunswick decides is, that such pleadings raising the issue of law may be referred to in the trial of the issue of fact.

Byles, Serjt.—The plaintiff is not entitled to the cost of the service of the copy of the writ on the prosecutor, which has been proved to be an unnecessary proceeding; nor can he recover from the defendants the item of 1*l.* charged for money advanced to enable him to return home from London after his discharge.

Parke, B. in summing up the case to the jury, said that in such an action the just and proper measure of damages would be the sum to which the plaintiff had been fairly and reasonably put by the illegal conduct of the defendants. The question here was, whether the bill of costs was a proper one under the peculiar circumstances of the case. The plaintiff could not be entitled to recover all his attorney might choose to charge him, but only such sums as were reasonably necessary to procure his discharge. The jury would therefore say whether the sum of 25*l.* was sufficient for that purpose. It had been said that the costs of serving the prosecutor with the copy of the bill were not to be allowed; but it did appear to him that the step was a reasonable one, for it was difficult to say that it was not a necessary precaution. Then again, as to the allowance of the 1*l.* for travelling home, the plaintiff had a right to receive all that was necessary to reinstate him in his status quo ante bellum, and if he could not be so reinstated after his discharge without the expenditure of that sum in travelling home, he was justly entitled to it, though it was advanced to him by his attorney.

The jury retired for three hours, and not being able to agree, were ultimately discharged, the parties having agreed to a compromise.

Jury discharged.

Reg. v. Connor and Another.

Depositions—Additional evidence—Committal.

Where additional evidence has been obtained on the part of the prosecution, after the return of the depositions and committal of the prisoner, he is not entitled either to copies of such evidence or a list of the witnesses. He may, however, look at the bill in court.

A true bill having been returned against the prisoners for arson, Gurdon applied on their behalf to the Court for an order under the following circumstances:—Since the committal of the prisoners, and the return of the depositions, copies of which they had been supplied with in the usual manner, it was understood that a great body of additional evidence had been obtained against them, on which, no doubt, the bill had been found by the grand jury. Of the value of this evidence the prisoners were wholly ignorant, and as it was out of their power to take copies of the statements in question under the Act, as there had not been any depositions returned, the present application was adopted, its object being to get at the additional evidence by means of an order of the Court, which, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, it was submitted there could not be any hesitation to grant. It was manifest that great injustice might be inflicted on prisoners if this course were to be pursued as a general rule. The recent Act had provided that they might have access to the evidence intended to be brought forward against them on certain terms; but its provisions might be altogether evaded by the prosecutor, who might keep back the most important witnesses when before the magistrate, and obtain a committal on wholly insufficient testimony, if he were not to be compelled by the Court to furnish them with copies of all the evidence on which the bill was found.

Prendergast, on the part of the prosecution, opposed the application, and on the short ground that the Court had no power at all over the matter. The case was an ordinary one, in which fresh evidence had been obtained after the charge had been instituted before the magistrates, and there was no jurisdiction to make any such order as that now prayed for by his learned friend.

Patteson, J.—It certainly appears to me that I have no power to interfere. It is certainly very desirable that the whole evidence should be supplied to the prisoners, but I do not understand that any complaint is made here of any undue withholding of evidence before the magistrates. It is then the ordinary case of fresh evidence being adduced before the grand jury, returns of which cannot of course be made by the magistrates. I have no authority to interfere in such a case, for the Act does not empower a judge to order the prosecutor to furnish the prisoner with all the evidence. The Act, indeed, says nothing about prosecutors; it only provides that the prisoner may have copies of the depositions from the clerk of the peace.

Gurdon then applied to his lordship to order the prosecutor to furnish his client with a list of the witnesses in question, which would answer his purpose.

Prendergast objected to this likewise.—The witnesses might be tampered with before the case was called on.

Gurdon then requested permission to look at the back of the bill himself.

Prendergast.—No: you can look at the face of the bill, but the list of witnesses on the back is no part of the bill, and you cannot look at that.

Patteson, J.—The counsel for the prisoner may look at the bill, but if it be objected that he cannot look at the list of witnesses indorsed thereon, I am bound to say that I have no power to enforce compliance with that request. At the same time, I think there ought not to be any opposition offered to that application.

Prendergast.—If your lordship thinks that ought to be done, I will consent to it.

The bill was then given to the learned counsel, who took a list of the witnesses' names.

WESTERN CIRCUIT.

SOMERSET SUMMER ASSIZES.

Bridgwater, August 8.

(Before Mr. Justice Erle.)

Reg. v. James Williams.

An unstamped banker's promissory note may be given in evidence, without any proof by the party tendering it that the bankers by whom such note was issued have complied with those rules which must be observed to enable bankers to issue their notes unstamped.

The prisoner was indicted for receiving two promissory notes of the respective value of 5*l.* The notes were described generally in the indictment, without any mention of the party by whom they were drawn, or by what bank they were issued.

Evidence was given by the prosecutor that he had been robbed on the highway of certain moneys, and among these of two 5*l.* notes of Stuckeys' Bank, by two persons, one of whom was the son of the prisoner, and who, with his accomplice, had been tried the day before, and convicted of the robbery. It was then proved that the prisoner, on the day after the robbery, had changed two 5*l.* notes under suspicious circumstances, and the prosecutor said that these two notes were the two notes of which he had been robbed. On the counsel for the prosecution tendering them in evidence,

Edwards, on behalf of the prisoner, objected to their reception, upon the ground that they were not stamped. He argued that, by the 55 Geo. 3, c. 184, schedule, part 1, a promissory note for 5*l.* requires a one shilling and threepenny stamp. It is true, by a subsequent statute, the legislature has empowered bankers, under certain conditions, to compound for their stamps, which having done, they are then authorized to issue their notes unstamped. It is possible the Messrs. Stuckeys have done this; but if they have, it lies on the party who tenders the note in evidence to shew their compliance with the provisions of the latter statute, so as to make these instruments legal evidence.

Erle, J.—I shall receive these notes in evidence. I think I am bound to presume that the Messrs. Stuckeys have complied with the provisions of the latter statute, and have not incurred a penalty of 50*l.* by issuing those notes. Besides, as this is a stamp objection, the party who makes it is bound to prove all the facts necessary to constitute the objection a good one. It is the same as where a cheque is tendered in evidence, which is always presumed to be drawn within the distance limited by the statute. If it was not, the onus of proving that fact lies on the party making the objection, and not on the party who tenders the cheque.(a)

The notes were thereupon read, and the prisoner was convicted.

Stone and Fitzherbert, for the prosecution.

Edwards, for the prisoner.

Reg. v. Tucker.

Indictment for embezzlement.

Quære, whether proof of a servant's absconding be sufficient to sustain an indictment for embezzlement?

It appeared, from the evidence, that the prisoner, a farm labourer, was sent by his master to deliver two sacks of potatoes, and to receive 10*s.* 6*d.* the price of them, and that, having delivered the potatoes and received the money, he never returned to his master, or accounted to him for the money so received. Six months afterwards, having in the interim kept out of the way, he was apprehended on this charge, and he then stated to the constable that he had received the money and spent it.

Erle, J. doubted whether this was sufficient evidence to sustain the indictment for embezzlement, inasmuch as it did not appear that the prisoner had ever denied the receipt of the money, or made any false statement respecting it.

H. Leigh, for the prosecution, cited R. v. Williams (7 C. & P. 338; 2 Russ. 181), in which, under similar circumstances, Coleridge, J. held that the fact of the prisoner's absconding was evidence of an intention to appropriate the money.

Phinn (amicus curiæ) mentioned a case (R. v. Norman, 9 C. & P.) in which Coleridge, J. had subsequently acted upon his decision in R. v. Williams.

Erle, J. still thought the offence, as proved, did not clearly amount to a felony, but, on the authority of the cases cited, he left the case to the jury, who returned a verdict of Not guilty.

H. Leigh, for the prosecution.

The prisoner was undefended.

WILTS SUMMER ASSIZES, 1845.

Devizes, August 11.

(Before Mr. Justice Erle.)

Reg. v. Dredge.

In a charge of larceny, if the prosecutor cannot swear to the loss of the article said to be stolen, the prisoner must be acquitted.

The prisoner, a little boy, was indicted for stealing a doll and other toys.

It was proved, on the part of the prosecutor, that the prosecutor kept a large toy-shop at Tunbridge. On a day named in the indictment, the prisoner came into the shop dressed in a smock frock, and after remaining there some time, from some suspicion that was excited, he was searched, and under this smock-frock were found concealed a doll, six toy-houses, and other such things. The prosecutor swore that he believed the toy-houses to be his property, because they exactly resembled other toys of the same sort, which he had in his shop; and he gave the evidence with regard to all the other articles except the doll. With respect to that, his evidence went still further, as he swore the doll had been his, as he found upon it his private mark. But he could not say that he had not sold it, and he had not missed, and could not miss, from the nature of his stock, any of the articles which the prisoner was charged with stealing.

Erle, J.—It seems to me that you have failed to establish in this case the corpus delicti. It is true the prosecutor swears that the doll was once his, but he cannot state that it was taken from him: and for aught that appears to the contrary, the prisoner may have come by it in an honest manner.

Sewine, on the part of the prosecution, contended that it must be presumed the prisoner had taken the articles. From the mode in which the prosecutor kept his stock, it was impossible for him to miss them; but, looking at the prisoner, and the place where these articles were taken from him, it becomes a natural presumption that he had taken them.

Erle, J.—I can make no other presumption in this case than I should be justified in doing if the most respectable person were charged with the offence. I think you have failed to make out your case.

(a) Sed quære. In the case put by the learned judge, the affirmative is upon the party objecting, which, by the ordinary rules of evidence, he is bound to establish. In this case, on the contrary, he would have to prove a negative. We are informed that this same objection was taken before Mr. Justice Coleridge, on this circuit, who appeared to consider it a valid one. But the prisoner in that case had received other moneys or goods, with respect to which the objection did not apply. The case was therefore allowed to proceed in respect of those unobjectionable things, so that no formal judgment was given by that learned judge as to this objection.

His lordship then directed the jury to acquit the prisoner, which they accordingly did.

Swaine, for the prosecution.

Prisoner undefended.

Reg. v. Eleanor May.

Evidence of another felony will be received, when it is necessary to establish the charge on which the prisoner is being tried.

The prisoner was indicted for stealing a halfpenny.

The prisoner was a servant in the employ of the prosecutor. Having some suspicion, he marked a quantity of pence and halfpence, and put them in a bureau, which he locked and took the key. On the 9th of July he missed one halfpenny, and on the 13th of the same month others were taken. When the prosecutor had proved the loss of the one halfpenny, he was going on to prove the loss of the others.

Hodges, on the part of the prisoner, objected to this, contending that, having proved all that was laid in the indictment, the prosecutor could not give evidence of another taking, at another time, as that must form the subject-matter of a separate charge.

Ball, for the prosecution, stated that the latter evidence was necessary for the support of the charge on which the prisoner was then being tried.

Erle, J.—If that be the case, I shall admit the evidence, since it matters not that it may apply to another charge, if it be relevant and necessary for the support of this.

The prosecutor then gave evidence of his second loss on the 13th, after which the prisoner was searched, and all the marked pence found upon her. He could not say which of these was stolen on the 9th, but he said it must be one of them.

Erle, J. told the jury, if they were of opinion that all the halfpence found on the prisoner were properly identified by the prosecutor, they would convict her; but if they had any doubts in reference to either of the halfpence (as the prosecutor could not say which was taken on the 9th), they must acquit her.

One halfpenny not being so plainly identified as the others, the jury acquitted her.

Ball, for the prosecution.

Hodges, for the prisoner.

Devizes, August 13.

(Before Mr. Justice Erle.)

Reg. v. Shepherd.

The jury cannot inspect writings which are not writings in the cause, for the purpose of ascertaining if the handwriting of a paper in issue is the same as in such writings.

A scientific inspector of writings will not be allowed to inspect such paper, and other writings in the cause, for the purpose of proving by the comparison that they are both written by the same person.

The prisoner was indicted under the 4 Geo. 4, c. 54, s. 3, for sending a threatening letter to Sir Francis Astley, threatening to burn down his house, &c.

There was no direct evidence of the prisoner sending the letter. This fact was, therefore, attempted to be made out, on the part of the prosecution, by proving the letter to be in the prisoner's handwriting. For this purpose a witness was called who had belonged to a club of which the prisoner was the secretary, and who, in that capacity, had frequently been seen to write by the witness. The book in which the prisoner had made the entries for the club was produced, and the witness was allowed to refresh his memory of his handwriting by an inspection of these entries. He was then shewn the letter which formed the subject-matter of this indictment, and was asked if he considered it to be in the handwriting of the prisoner. The witness, after examining the letter, replied, that, judging from the character of the writing, he should be of opinion that it was not.

Merewether, for the prosecution, then proposed that the entries in the book produced, and the letter in question, should be put into the hands of the jury, and that they should make a comparison of the handwriting and form their own conclusion.

Erle, J.—No. I cannot allow that. The judge and jury are at liberty to look at any papers in the cause; they may inspect them and compare them, and form such a conclusion as the comparison is calculated to lead to, without saying any thing to any person on the subject. But I cannot permit an inspection, for this purpose, of papers or writings which are not material for the proof of the case, and which therefore are not properly papers or writings in the cause. If this were allowed, particular entries may be selected for the purpose, differing materially from the prisoner's general handwriting, and a wrong impression be thereby produced.

Merewether then called a gentleman from Doctors' Commons, whose duty it was to inspect wills for the purpose of detecting any fraud or forgery appearing on them. He proposed to put the letter, for writing which the prisoner was indicted, into the hands of this witness; and also another writing, proved to be the prisoner's, and which was given in evidence as a part of the prosecutor's case; and to ask the witness, looking at them both, whether he was of opinion that they were both written by the same person.

Erle, J.—The rules of evidence, as applicable to this case, will not allow you to do this. You may call a scientific witness to disprove by comparison the writing at issue from being the writing of the party whose writing it is said to be, but not to affirm it. All that you are authorized to ask this witness, as a scientific witness, is, as to his belief of the writing being in a natural or feigned hand; but if he says it is in a feigned hand, you cannot go further, and ask him as to his belief of its being written by the same party as wrote another piece of writing shewn to him.

The witness was then asked whether he considered the handwriting of the letter a feigned or natural one. He replied, there could be no doubt it was a feigned one. The prosecutor not being able to carry his evidence further, to shew that this feigned handwriting was the handwriting of the prisoner, he was acquitted.

Merewether, for the prosecution.

The prisoner was undefended.

Bristol, Aug. 18.

Gegg v. Perrin and Another.

Where two defendants in trespass have joined in pleading, and pleaded a justification, a verdict cannot be taken for either defendant at the close of the plaintiff's case, although the plaintiff has offered no evidence whatever against such defendant.

This was an action of trespass for taking certain goods.

The defendants had joined in their pleading, and among other pleas had pleaded "Not Guilty," and a justification.

The defendant Perrin was the owner of a house, which had been rented by B. (a brother of plaintiff) for some time. Rent was in arrear, after which B. moved certain goods from his own house, which he occupied under the defendant Perrin, to his brother's, the plaintiff's house, where they were seized by the defendants for the rent due, and it was for this seizure that the present action was brought, in which the goods were alleged to be the goods and chattels of the plaintiff. The plaintiff gave no evidence at all affecting the defendant Perrin, as shewing that he had any thing to do in the matter.

Kinglake, Serjt. at the close of the plaintiff's case, applied to the learned judge, that a verdict should at once be taken for the defendant Perrin, upon the ground that no evidence whatever had been given against her.

Crowder objected to this. He admitted that he had offered no evidence against the defendant in question, but contended, that an application of this sort would not be granted, unless the judge trying the case was of opinion that the defendant, for whom a verdict was sought to be taken, had been fraudulently or improperly made so, for the purpose of preventing each defendant from giving evidence for the others. He cited White v. Hill, reported in 14 L. J. 79, Q. B. In that case all the previous decisions upon the matter had been reviewed, and the Court had laid down the rule he had referred to, as that which was to govern learned judges in such cases for the future. Besides, in this case the defendants had joined in their pleading, and had put upon the record a plea of justification, by which they admitted, so far as that issue is concerned, that they did both take the goods, justifying such taking by the facts set up in the plea.

Erle, J.—This is so. I am clearly of opinion, if two defendants join in their pleading in this way, that the case against either should not be stopped, as prayed for by my brother Kinglake, but should go to the jury.

The learned serjeant, therefore, proceeded in his defence with regard to both of the defendants.

Crowder and Stone, for the plaintiff.

Kinglake and Prideaux, for the defendants.

Reg. v. Hannah Banks.

Where goods are found in the house of a married man, and such possession is proved as evidence of a larceny, they must be considered in his possession, and not in possession of his wife, unless she says any thing implicating herself, in which case it must be left to the jury to decide in whose possession they were.

The prisoner was indicted for a larceny.

There was no evidence given to shew how the goods had been taken, but they were found in the house of the prisoner's husband, he being a blind man. When they were discovered, the prisoner said she had purchased them a long time before.

Slade, for the prisoner, contended that there was no evidence to go to the jury as against the prisoner. The goods were found in the house of the prisoner's husband, who was living there, and in whose possession therefore they must be considered to have been, and not in the possession of the prisoner. He cited R. v. Archer (1 Mood. C.C. 143), and a passage from Dalton, c. 157, p. 353, where it is thus laid down:—"Where stolen goods are received by a married woman in the absence of her husband, and are concealed in his house without his knowledge, she alone may be indicted and punished for the offence; but if the husband's ignorance be not satisfactorily proved, the law will, in most cases, impute the receiving to him."

Erle, J.—I quite agree with that, and if the prisoner had said nothing, and the goods had simply been found in the house of the husband, I should think there was no evidence to go to the jury. But as she said she bought the goods, I think it must be left to the jury to decide whether the goods were in her possession or the possession of her husband.

The learned judge then left this question to the jury, telling them if they were of opinion that the goods were in the possession of the wife, and were so without the consent and control of the husband, they must find her guilty; but if they had any doubt of this, they must acquit her.

The jury acquitted her.

Merewether, for the prosecution.

Slade, for the prisoner.

Cap. CVI.

An Act to amend the Law of Real Property. (August 4, 1845.)

Be it enacted by the Queen's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows: (that is to say,)

1. Repeal of so much of 7 & 8 Vict. c. 76, as abolishes contingent remainders as from the commencement; and the residue as from 1st October, 1845.—That so much of an Act passed in the last session of Parliament, intituled "An Act to simplify the Transfer of Property," as enacted that, after the time at which that Act should come into operation, no estate in land should be created by way of contingent remainder; but that every estate which, before that time, would have taken effect as a contingent remainder should take effect (if in a will or codicil) as an executory devise, and (if in a deed) as an executory estate of the same nature, and having the same properties as an executory devise; and that contingent remainders existing under deeds, wills, or instruments, executed or made before the time when that Act should come into operation, should not fail, or be destroyed or barred, merely by reason of the destruction or merger of any preceding estate, or its determination by any other means than the natural effluxion of the time of such preceding estate, or some event on which it was in its creation limited to determine, shall be and is hereby repealed, as from the time of the commencement and taking effect thereof; and that the residue of the said Act shall be and is hereby repealed, as from the first day of October One thousand eight hundred and forty-five.

2. The immediate freehold of corporeal tenements to lie in grant as well as in livery—Stamp-duty on grants thereof.—That, after the said first day of October One thousand eight hundred and forty-five, all corporeal tenements and hereditaments shall, as regards the conveyance of the immediate freehold thereof, be deemed to lie in grant as well as in livery; and that every deed which, by force only of this enactment, shall be effectual as a grant, shall be chargeable with the stamp-duty with which the same deed would have been chargeable in case the same had been a release, founded on a lease or bargain and sale for a year, and also with the same stamp-duty (exclusive of progressive duty) with which such lease or bargain and sale for a year would have been chargeable.

3. Feoffments, partitions, exchanges, leases, assignments, and surrenders required (subject to certain exceptions) to be by deed.—That a feoffment, made after the said first day of October One thousand eight hundred and forty-five, other than a feoffment made under a custom by an infant, shall be void at law, unless evidenced by deed; and that a partition, and an exchange, of any tenements or hereditaments, not being copyhold, and a lease, required by law to be in writing, of any tenements or hereditaments, and an assignment of a chattel interest, not being copyhold, in any tenements or hereditaments, and a surrender in writing of any interest in any tenements or hereditaments not being a copyhold interest, and not being an interest which might by law have been created without writing, made after the said first day of October One thousand eight hundred and forty-five, shall also be void at law, unless made by deed: Provided always, that the said enactment, so far as the same relates to a release or a surrender, shall not extend to Ireland.

4. Feoffments not to operate by wrong, nor exchanges or partitions to imply any condition, or give and grant any covenant.—That a feoffment, made after the said first day of October One thousand eight hundred and forty-five, shall not have any tortious operation; and that an exchange, or a partition, of any tenements or hereditaments, made by deed, executed after the said first day of October One thousand eight hundred and forty-five, shall not imply any condition in law; and that the word "give" or the word "grant," in a deed, executed after the same day, shall not imply any covenant in law, in respect of any tenements or hereditaments, except so far as the word "give" or the word "grant" may, by force of any act of Parliament, imply a covenant.

5. Strangers may take immediately under an indenture, and a deed purporting to be an indenture shall take effect as such.—That, under an indenture, executed after the first day of October One thousand eight hundred and forty-five, an immediate estate or interest, in any tenements or hereditaments, and the benefit of a condition or covenant, respecting any tenements or hereditaments, may be taken, although the taker thereof be not named a party to the same indenture; also, that a deed, executed after the said first day of October One thousand eight hundred and forty-five, purporting to be an indenture, shall have the effect of an indenture although not actually indented.

6. Contingent and other like interests, also rights of entry, made alienable by deed, saving estates in tail; and as regards married women enjoining conformity to 3 & 4 Wm. 4, c. 74.—4 & 5 Wm. 4, c. 92.—That, after the first day of October, One thousand eight hundred and forty-five, a contingent, an executory, and a future interest, and a possibility coupled with an interest, in any tenements or hereditaments of any tenure, whether the object of the gift or limitation of such interest or possibility be or be not ascertained, also a right of entry, whether immediate or future, and whether vested or contingent, into or upon any tenements or hereditaments in England, of any tenure, may be disposed of by deed, but that no such disposition shall, by force only of this Act, defeat or enlarge an estate tail; and that every such disposition by a married woman shall be made conformably to the provisions, relative to dispositions by married women, of an Act passed in the third and fourth years of the reign of his late Majesty King William the Fourth, intituled, "An Act for the abolition of Fines and Recoveries, and for the Substitution of more simple Modes of Assurance," or in Ireland of any Act passed in the fourth and fifth years of the reign of his said late Majesty, intituled, "An Act for the Abolition of Fines and Recoveries, and for the Substitution of more simple Modes of Assurance, in Ireland."

7. Capacity of married woman to disclaim estates or interests by deed extended to England.—That, after the first day of October, One thousand eight hundred and forty-five, an estate or interest in any tenements or hereditaments in England, of any tenure, may be disclaimed by a married woman by deed; and that every such disclaimer shall be made conformably to the said provisions of the said "Act for the Abolition of Fines and Recoveries, and for the substitution of more simple Modes of Assurance."

8. Contingent remainders protected as from Dec. 31, 1844, against the premature failure of a preceding estate.—That a contingent remainder, existing at any time after the thirty-first day of December, One thousand eight hundred and forty-four, shall be, and, if created before the passing of this Act, shall be deemed to have been, capable of taking effect, notwithstanding the determination, by forfeiture, surrender, or merger, of any preceding estate of freehold in the same manner, in all respects, as if such determination had not happened.

9. When the reversion on a lease is gone the next estate to be deemed the reversion.—That when the reversion expectant on a lease, made either before or after the passing of this Act, of any tenements or hereditaments, of any tenure, shall, after the said first day of October, one thousand eight hundred and forty-five, be surrendered or merge, the estate which shall, for the time being, confer as against the tenant under the same lease the next vested right to the same tenements or hereditaments, shall, to the extent and for the purpose of preserving such incidents to, and obligations on, the same reversion, as but for the surrender or merger thereof, would have subsisted, be deemed the reversion expectant on the same lease.

10. Act not to extend to Scotland.—That this Act shall not extend to Scotland.

Cap. CXII.

An Act to render the Assignment of satisfied Terms unnecessary. (August 8, 1845.)

On 31st December, 1845, satisfied terms of years attendant on inheritance, &c. of land, to cease, except, &c.—Whereas the assignment of satisfied terms has been found to be attended with great difficulty, delay and expense, and to operate in many cases to the prejudice of the persons justly entitled to the lands to which they relate: Be it therefore enacted by the Queen's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, That every satisfied term of years which, either by express declaration or by construction of law, shall upon the thirty-first day of December, One thousand eight hundred and forty-five be attendant upon the inheritance or reversion of any lands, shall on that day absolutely cease and determine as to the land upon the inheritance or reversion whereof such term shall be attendant as aforesaid, except that every such term of years which shall be so attendant as aforesaid by express declaration, although hereby made to cease and determine, shall afford to every person the same protection against every incumbrance, charge, estate, right, action, suit, claim, and demand as it would have afforded to him if it had continued to subsist, but had not been assigned or dealt with, after the said thirty first day of December One thousand eight hundred and forty-five, and shall for the purpose of such protection be considered in every court of law and of equity to be a subsisting term.

2. Satisfied terms now subsisting, &c. to cease on becoming attendant upon inheritance, &c. of lands.—And be it enacted, that every term of years now subsisting or hereafter to be created, becoming satisfied after the said thirty-first day of December, One thousand eight hundred and forty-five, and which, either by express declaration or by construction of law, shall after that day become attendant upon the inheritance or reversion of any lands, shall immediately upon the same becoming so attendant absolutely cease and determine as to the land upon the inheritance or reversion whereof such term shall become attendant as aforesaid.

3. Construction of Act.—And be it enacted, That in the construction and for the purposes of this Act, unless there be something in the subject or context repugnant to such construction, the word "lands" shall extend to all freehold tenements and hereditaments, whether corporeal or incorporeal, and to all such customary land as will pass by deed, or deed and admittance, and not by surrender, or any undivided part or share thereof respectively; and every word importing the singular number only shall extend and be applied to several persons or things as well as one person or thing; and every word importing the masculine gender only shall extend and be applied to a female as well as a male.

4. Not to extend to Scotland.—And be it enacted, That this Act shall not extend to Scotland.

Cap. CXIII.

An Act to facilitate the Admission in Evidence of certain official and other Documents. (August 8, 1845.)

1. Certain documents to be received in evidence without proof of seal or signature, &c. of person signing the same.—Whereas it is provided by many statutes that various certificates, official and public documents, documents and proceedings of corporations and of joint-stock and other companies, and certified copies of documents, bye-laws, entries in registers and other books, shall be receivable in evidence of certain particulars in courts of justice, provided they be respectively authenticated in the manner prescribed by such statutes: And whereas the beneficial effect of these provisions has been found by experience to be greatly diminished by the difficulty of proving that the said documents are genuine; and it is expedient to facilitate the admission in evidence of such and the like documents: Be it therefore enacted by the Queen's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that whenever by any Act now in force or hereafter to be in force, any certificate, official or public document, or document or proceeding of any corporation or joint-stock or other company, or any certified copy of any document, bye-law, entry in any register or other book, or of any other proceeding, shall be receivable in evidence of any particular in any court of justice, or before any legal tribunal, or either House of Parliament, or any committee of either House, or in any judicial proceeding, the same shall respectively be admitted in evidence, provided they respectively purport to be sealed or impressed with a stamp, or sealed and signed, or signed alone, as required, or impressed with a stamp and signed, as directed by the respective Acts made or to be hereafter made, without any proof of the seal or stamp, where a seal or stamp is necessary, or of the signature, or of the official character of the person appearing to have signed the same, and without any further proof thereof in every case in which the original record could have been received in evidence.

2. Courts, &c. to take judicial notice of signature of equity or common law judges, &c.—And be it enacted, That all courts, judges, justices, masters in Chancery, masters of courts, commissioners judicially acting, and other judicial officers shall henceforth take judicial notice of the signature of any of the equity or common law judges of the superior courts at Westminster, provided such signature be attached or appended to any decree, order, certificate, or other judicial or official document.

3. Copies of private Acts, printed by Queen's printer, Journals of Parliament and Proclamations, admissible as evidence. And be it enacted, That all copies of private and local and personal Acts of Parliament not public Acts, if purporting to be printed by the Queen's printers, and all copies of the journals of either House of Parliament, and of royal proclamations, purporting to be printed by the printers to the Crown, or by the printers to either House of Parliament, or by any or either of them, shall be admitted as evidence thereof by all courts, judges, justices, and others, without any proof being given that such copies were so printed.

4. Persons forging seal, stamp, or signature of certain documents, or print any private Act with false purport, guilty of felony.—Provided always, and be it enacted, That if any person shall forge the seal, stamp, or signature of any such certificate, official or public document, or document or proceeding of any corporation or joint stock or other company, or of any certified copy of any document, bye law, entry in any register or other book, or other proceeding as aforesaid, or shall tender in evidence any such certificate, official or public document, or document or proceeding of any corporation or joint stock or other company, or any certified copy of any document, bye law, entry in any register or other book, or of any other proceeding, with a false or counterfeit seal, stamp, or signature thereto, knowing the same to be false or counterfeit, whether such seal, stamp, or signature be those of or relating to any corporation or company already established, or to any corporation or company to be hereafter established, or if any person shall forge the signature of any such judge as aforesaid to any order, decree, certificate, or other judicial or official document, or shall tender in evidence any order, decree, certificate, or other judicial or official document, with a false or counterfeit signature of any such judge as aforesaid thereto, knowing the same to be false or counterfeit, or if any person shall print any copy of any private Act or of the journals of either House of Parliament, which copy shall falsely purport to have been printed by the printers to the Crown, or by the printers to either House of Parliament, or by any or either of them, or if any person shall tender in evidence any such copy, knowing that the same was not printed by the person or persons by whom it so purports to have been printed, every such person shall be guilty of felony, and shall upon conviction be liable to transportation for seven years, or to imprisonment for any term not more than three nor less than one year, with hard labour: provided also, that whenever any such document as before mentioned shall have been received in evidence by virtue of this Act, the Court, judge, commissioner, or other person officiating judicially, who shall have admitted the same, shall, on the request of any party against whom the same is so received, be authorized, at its or at his own discretion, to direct that the same shall be impounded, and be kept in the custody of some officer of the court or other proper person, until further order touching the same shall be given, either by such Court, or the court to which such Master or other officer belonged, or by the persons or person who constituted such court, or by some one of the equity or common law judges of the superior courts at Westminster on application being made for that purpose.

5. Not to extend to Scotland.—And be it enacted, That this Act shall not extend to Scotland.

6. Alteration of Act.—And be it enacted, That this Act may be repealed, altered, or amended during this present session of Parliament.

7. Commencement of Act.—And be it enacted, That this Act shall take effect from the first day of November next after the passing thereof.

Cap. CXIX.

An Act to facilitate the Conveyance of Real Property. (8th August, 1845.)

1. Where the words of Column 1 of the second schedule are employed, the deed to have the same effect as if the words in Column 2 were inserted.—Whereas it is expedient to facilitate the sale and conveyance of real property: Be it enacted by the Queen's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, That whenever any party to any deed, made according to the forms set forth in the first schedule to this Act, or to any other deed which shall be expressed to be made in pursuance of this Act, or referring thereto, shall employ in any such deed respectively any of the form of words contained in Column 1 of the second schedule hereto annexed, and distinguished by any number therein, such deed shall be taken to have the same effect and be construed as if such party had inserted in such deed the form of words contained in Column 2 of the same schedule, and distinguished by the same number as is annexed to the form of words employed by such party; but it shall not be necessary in any such deed to insert any such number.

2. Deed to include all houses, &c. and the reversion and all the estate.—That every such deed, unless any exception be specially made therein, shall be held and construed to include all houses, outhouses, edifices, barns, stables, yards, gardens, orchards, commons, trees, woods, underwoods, mounds, fences, hedges, ditches, ways, waters, watercourses, lights, liberties, privileges, easements, profits, commodities, emoluments, hereditaments, and appurtenances whatsoever to the lands therein comprised, belonging, or in anywise appertaining, or with the same demised, held, used, occupied, and enjoyed, or taken or known as part or parcel thereof, and also the reversion or reversions, remainder or remainders, yearly and other rents, issues, and profits of the same lands, and of every part and parcel thereof, and all the estate, right, title, interest, inheritance, use, trust, property, profit, possession, claim, and demand whatsoever, both at law and in equity, of the grantor, in, to, out of, or upon the same lands and every part and parcel thereof, with their and every of their appurtenances.

3. Stamp duty on deed to be same as on lease, &c. for a year.—That every such deed under this Act shall be chargeable with the stamp duty with which the same would have been chargeable in case it had been a release founded on a lease or bargain and sale for a year, and also with the same stamp duty (exclusive of progressive duty) with which such lease or bargain and sale for a year would have been chargeable.

4. Remuneration for deed under the Act not to be by length only.—That in taxing any bill for preparing and executing any deed under this Act, it shall be lawful for the taxing-officer, and he is hereby required, in estimating the proper sum to be charged for such transaction, to consider not the length of such deed, but only the skill and labour employed and responsibility incurred in the preparation thereof.

5. Deed failing to take effect by this Act to be as valid as if Act not made.—That any deed or part of a deed which shall fail to take effect by virtue of this Act shall nevertheless be as valid and effectual, and shall bind the parties thereto, so far as the rules of law and equity will permit, as if this Act had not been made.

6. Construction of Act.—That in the construction and for the purposes of this Act and the schedules hereto annexed, unless there be something in the subject or context repugnant to such construction, the word "lands" shall extend to all freehold tenements and hereditaments, whether corporeal or incorporeal, and to such customary land as will pass by deed, or deed and admittance, and not by surrender, or any undivided part or share thereof respectively; and every word importing the singular number only, shall extend and be applied to several persons or things, as well as one person or thing, and the converse; and every person importing the masculine gender only, shall extend and be applied to a female as well as a male; and the word "party" shall mean and include any body politic, or corporate or collegiate, as well as an individual.

7. Schedules, &c. to form part of Act.—That the schedules, and the directions and forms therein contained, shall be deemed and taken to be parts of this Act.

8. Commencement of Act.—That the Act shall commence and take effect from and after the first day of October next.

9. Not to extend to Scotland.—That this Act shall not extend to Scotland.

Cap. CXXIV.

An Act to facilitate the granting of certain leases. (8th August, 1845.)

1. Where the words of Column I. of the second schedule employed, the deed to have the same effect as if words of Column II. were inserted.—Whereas it is expedient to facilitate the leasing of lands and tenements: be it enacted by the Queen's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that whenever any party to any deed made according to the forms set forth in the first schedule to this Act, or to any other deed which shall be expressed to be made in pursuance of this Act, shall employ in such deed respectively any of the forms of words contained in Column I. of the second schedule hereto annexed, and distinguished by any number therein, such deed shall be taken to have the same effect and be construed as if such party had inserted in such deed the form of words contained in Column II. of the same schedule, and distinguished by the same number as is annexed to the form of words employed by such party; but it shall not be necessary in any such deed to insert any such number.

2. Deed to include all houses, &c.—That every such deed, unless any exception be specially made therein, shall be held and construed to include all outhouses, buildings, barns, stables, yards, gardens, cellars, ancient and other lights, paths, passages, ways, waters, watercourses, liberties, privileges, easements, profits, commodities, emoluments, hereditaments, and appurtenances whatsoever, to the lands and tenements therein comprised belonging or in anywise appertaining.

3. Remuneration for deed under the Act not to be by length only.—That in taxing any bill for preparing and executing any deed under this Act, it shall be lawful for the taxing officer, and he is hereby required, in estimating the proper sum to be charged for such transaction, to consider, not the length of such deed, but only the skill and labour employed, and responsibility incurred, in the preparation thereof.

4. Deed failing to take effect by this Act to be as valid as if Act not made.—That any deed or part of a deed which shall fail to take effect by virtue of this Act shall nevertheless be as valid and effectual, and shall bind the parties thereto, so far as the rules of law and equity will permit, as if this Act had not been made.

5. Construction clause.—That in the Construction and for the purposes of this Act, and the schedules hereto annexed, unless there be something in the subject or context repugnant to such construction, the word "lands" shall extend to all tenements and hereditaments of freehold tenure, and to such customary lands as will pass by deed, or deed and surrender, and not by surrender alone, or any undivided part or share therein respectively; and every word importing the singular number only shall extend and be applied to several persons or things as well as one person or thing, and the converse; and every word importing the masculine gender only shall extend and be applied to a female as well as a male; and the word "party" shall mean and include any body politic or corporate, or collegiate, as well as an individual.

6. Schedules, &c. part of Act.—That the schedules, and the directions and forms therein contained, shall be deemed and taken to be parts of this Act.

7. Commencement of Act.—That this Act shall commence and take effect from and after the first day of October.

8. Act not to extend to Scotland.—That this Act shall not extend to Scotland.

THE LAWYER.

Summary.

The following Law Bills have been either withdrawn from the House of Commons during the session, with the intention of re-introduction next year, or were postponed at the rising of Parliament to the ensuing session. The list, it will be seen, embraces some very important measures, which deserve the consideration of the Profession, that it may be prepared for change, and ready to resist any encroachments upon its rights which the framers of the measures may intend.—Granting of Leases; Ecclesiastical Courts; Charitable Trusts; Debtor and Creditor; Courts of Common Law Process; Clerks of the Peace and Justices' Clerks; Actions of Debt Limitation: Divorce (Privy Council); Civil Actions; Declaratory Suits; Real Property Deeds Registration; Death by Accidents; Deodands Abolition; Administration of Criminal Justice; City of London Trade; Elective Franchise Extension; Independence of Parliament; Marriage Law Amending; Church Discipline Act Repeal; Drainage of Lands; Chattel Interests.

Several interesting commentaries upon the laws and their administration, and on practice, will be found subjoined.

ON TAKING INSTRUCTIONS FOR WILLS.

There are few of the duties of the solicitor which, by people in general, are considered more easy to perform than that of preparing a will; and yet the duty involves more responsibility and difficulty than is commonly supposed. Every village schoolmaster who is capable of writing a letter is supposed to have sufficient capacity and education to draw a will; and from such a person, as a cheaper assistant than the solicitor, many have sought advice and aid in this most important and difficult transaction; and the persons who were intended to benefit by the testator's bounty have had cause to rue the ill-advised parsimony of their deceased friend. The testator lives not to witness the ruinous consequences of his folly, but the objects of his bounty find themselves in possession of a costly chancery suit, instead of the enjoyment of that which the testator intended should readily pass to them. This may not be the case where the will consists merely of a series of simple gifts to the legatees of the testator; but how seldom is it that a testator is satisfied with the simple transfer of the property to his legatees. Endeavouring to exercise a right of ownership over his property after he has ceased to enjoy it, he seeks to fetter his gift with conditions and limitations, of the effects of which he is so ignorant, that he appears often to have intentionally obscured his meaning, if, indeed, he may be said to have had any meaning at all. "Testators," recently observed an eminent judge, "seem inexhaustible in their devices for puzzling courts of justice:" and so they will continue to be so long as, without any knowledge of the legal effect of their words and intentions, they prepare their own wills, or intrust the preparation of them to individuals as ignorant of the subject as themselves.

It becomes, then, the duty of solicitors, when called upon to prepare a will, not only to draw the will so as to effect the testator's intention as nearly as the rules of law will allow, but also to explain the ultimate consequences of the testator's wishes being carried into effect, and to advise him to adopt a better course if such should appear necessary. A solicitor is not to be a mere instrument to effectuate as nearly as possible a testator's intention, but a higher and a moral duty devolves upon him in the matter; viz. that of an adviser for the benefit of the testator's family, or any other objects of the testator's bounty.

In considering in detail this duty of advising, we would divide the subject into the four following particulars; viz. 1st, the condition of the testator himself; 2nd, the position of the testator's family; 3rd, the nature of the testator's property; and 4th, the limitations proposed by the testator.

And 1st, as to the condition of the testator himself. A solicitor, before proceeding to take instructions for preparing a will, should satisfy himself that the party is not incapacitated from making it. The principal difficulty which will arise in this case will be as to the mental capacity of the testator; and therefore we will shortly state the other incapacitating circumstances, and afterwards proceed to consider more at length the degree of mental imbecility which will render a will made under its influence void.

By the 1 Vict. c. 26, no will made by any person under the age of 21 years shall be valid; and in connection with this it will be useful to remember that the day of a person's birth is included in the computation of his age, and there being in law no fraction of a day, a will may be made at any time on the day before that which is usually considered the 21st anniversary of his birth.

A feme covert is incapable of making a will except of that property over which a disposing power is expressly given to her, notwithstanding her coverture, by the instrument through which the interest is derived; and in all cases this exception from the incapacity of coverture appears rather to give a mere power of appointment in this particular form, than a power to make a will, though in effect the two things may be the same. An exception to the general incapacity of a married woman occurs when the husband has, by Act of Parliament, been banished for life, as the wife, in that case, may in all things act as a feme sole, and as if her husband were dead. (Countess of Portland v. Prodgers, 1 Ver. 104.) It would appear also, that where a husband is transported as a felon for a term of years, the legal disabilities of his wife are for that term suspended. (Vide Ex parte Franks, 1 M. & Scott, 11.)

The will of an alien devising lands is voidable, as he has only a defeasible title in the lands, which, however, it appears he may by will pass to a devisee.

A traitor is unable to make a will; this is also the case with a felon against whom sentence of death is recorded.

It remains, then, to state the rule as to those persons whose incapacity to make a will arises from mental inability. "An idiot, i.e. such a one as cannot number twenty, or tell what age he is, or the like, cannot make a testament or dispose of his lands or goods; and albeit he do make a wise, reasonable, and sensible testament, yet is the testament void. But such a one as is of a mean understanding only, that hath grossum caput, and is of the middle sort, between a wise man and a fool, is not prohibited to make a testament." (Shep. Touchstone, 403.) Mental imbecility, by reason of great age, or occasioned by drunkenness, will incapacitate a man from making a will.

A person who is born deaf, dumb, and blind cannot make a will, though blindness or deafness alone will not render a person incapable.

A mad or lunatic person cannot make a will; but there is some difficulty attending those cases in which a doubt may be raised as to the testator's sanity at the time of making his will. No general rule can be laid down for the guidance of the solicitor, but he will be careful particularly to note the circumstances of the case, lest the will should be subsequently disputed. He will also clearly satisfy himself of the testator's competency.

A person found lunatic by commission may make a will during a lucid interval, but the burden of proof of his sanity at the time will fall upon the parties who set up the will. (Hall v. Warren, 9 Ves. 605; Re Watts, 1 Curt. 591; Cartwright v. Cartwright, 1 Phil. 100.)

If the testator should be in a state of intoxication, the solicitor will of course decline to take instructions while the testator is in such a state of incompetency to attend properly to his affairs. If, however, the will proposed be a reasonable one, and such as the solicitor might suppose would be the will the testator would make if in his sound mind, the solicitor might perhaps be advised to take the instructions, but he should seek an opportunity of submitting them to the party again, before the will is prepared; for the fact of the will being prepared and ready for the testator's signature, might deter him from having those alterations made which his sounder state of mind might dictate.

The solicitor should also take care that the testator is not under the undue influence of others, for in Lord Donegal's case (2 Ves. sen. 407), Lord Hardwick said, that where imposition had been practised upon a man's weakness of understanding, relief might be obtained in cases of deeds or wills, although a commission on the ground of such weakness might be denied. (See also the case of Mountain v. Bennett, 1 Cox, 355.)

The mind of the testator may also be under some erroneous impression or bias, as in the remarkable case of Mr. Greenwood, mentioned by Lord Eldon in White v. Wilson (13 Ves. 89), (see also Dew v. Clarke, 3 Addams, 79), and here the solicitor should use his utmost endeavours to remove such impression, though, if his efforts prove ineffectual, he may fairly take instructions, and prepare the will according to the testator's wishes.

If the testator is in a dying state, it will be the anxious duty of the solicitor to satisfy himself that the party is in a competent state of mind to make a will, and then carefully to secure such testimony as may prove important in case the will be disputed. The medical attendant upon the testator may, in all such cases, be properly and usefully consulted as to the competency of his patient, and it would be desirable to provide that his evidence upon the subject may be given up to the time of the actual execution of the will.

2nd. With regard to the position of the testator's family, a delicate and important duty devolves upon the solicitor when advising the testator in the preparation of his will. The disunion which frequently arises in families gives too often a bias to the testator's mind, which, if permitted to have its full sway, works an irreparable injustice where a temporary punishment is all which the testator would, if acting upon dispassionate reason, wish to inflict. The misconduct of a child is visited by a total omission of all provision for that child, when, probably, the misconduct arose from improvidence or thoughtlessness, and a sparing provision doled out so as to guard against the evil which is feared, might effect more nearly the real wishes of the testator.

The solicitor should, therefore, in any case of a testator's desiring to omit all provision for any one of his children, place before him the real effect of such omission, and, if the circumstances justify it, should endeavour to induce him to provide for the child in such manner as may prevent the repetition of the fault of which the testator complains. Thus, if it be the case of a spendthrift, or a speculating, extravagant, or improvident person, the evil may be met by providing a weekly or monthly allowance; and in case of an attempt to assign or mortgage it, or of the party's becoming bankrupt or insolvent, that the allowance shall revert to the other objects of the testator's bounty, or shall form a provision for the wife and children of the assignor. It is important, however, to recollect here that the provision should not be given over for the benefit of the assignor himself, as such a gift over would be void in case of bankruptcy or insolvency, and the property would pass to the assignees.

The above illustration will suffice to shew the duty of the solicitor under this head. Many other cases will probably suggest themselves to the reader, but they will be found only to exemplify this general rule, that the solicitor should, to the extent that circumstances will allow, endeavour to prevent the testator's carrying into effect any contemplated injustice towards those for whom he is bound by natural or moral duty to provide.

3rd. As to the nature of the property the solicitor should make careful inquiry, so that the whole of the property intended by the testator to pass under his will should do so. This remark is of course primarily applicable to that property over which the testator has a power of appointment. The nature of the power and the intended objects of it should be ascertained by the solicitor, as the testator's wish might otherwise be defeated by including improper objects in the exercise of the power. It will be desirable that in every instance the exercise of a power should be kept distinct from the residuary or any other bequest or devise, unless it is perfectly clear that such bequest or devise is exclusively in favour of those persons and for those objects which are within the scope of the power. By the late Act it is not necessary that any other formalities should be observed in the execution of a power by will than those required by the Act for wills in general.

The recent Wills Amendment Act has prevented any questions arising as to joint or contingent estates, rights of entry, &c. as the will is made to operate in all cases, as if executed immediately before the death of the testator. It will be needless, therefore, under this head, to discuss the various questions which have arisen as to those interests under the old law.

If the property be renewable leaseholds, placed in the hands of trustees, a power to sell or mortgage the whole or a part, for the purpose of renewing the lease, should be given; as otherwise, if the property be small, or the fines upon renewal be heavy, much difficulty may arise in obtaining money to preserve the property for the benefit of the cestuis que trust. Although the intended cestuis que trust may be all sui juris, yet such a power is at all times desirable, as it can never be assumed that infants will not become parties interested, and then such a power will be absolutely necessary.

The solicitor will carefully consider and direct the attention of the testator to any inconveniences or disadvantages which may attend the gifts or limitations he may propose to make. Thus if a testator should desire to leave a small copyhold estate to several persons, as tenants in common, his attention should be called to the fact that separate fees on admission would be payable from each person. (1 Watkins on Copyholds, 299; 1 Pr. Wms. 21; Lord Raym. 631.) In such a case a testator might be advised to leave the whole of the estate to one, charged with the payment of a definite sum to each of the other persons he intended to benefit.

The latter observation may, perhaps, properly belong to the next head of remark, viz. as to the limitations proposed by the testator.

Testators are very frequently desirous of extending to the utmost their power over the property they leave, and, as in Mr. Thelusson's case, endeavour to create extraordinary provisions for that purpose; it should in all such cases be considered whether the advantage to be gained will be an equivalent for the disadvantages always attending such dispositions, and this should be pointedly brought under the consideration of the testator, and the position of the case clearly explained to him.

Upon this subject much prudent foresight and careful consideration will be necessary on the part of the solicitor. In the ordinary, as well as the extraordinary, cases of limitations, it will be the solicitor's duty to provide for every conceivable alteration of the circumstances under which the property, or the persons intended to be the partakers of it, may subsequently be placed. These are provisions which seldom enter into the contemplation of a testator, who too often treats the subject as if the property and its beneficial possessors would always remain in circumstances similar to those in which they are placed at the time of making the will.

The alterations, then, to which the various properties which form the subject of the devise or bequest,—the deaths, succession, substitution, infancy, and marriage of the cestuis que trust, or devisees, or legatees—must all be carefully provided for, and it will therefore be well for the solicitor, when taking instructions for a will, carefully to trace out to the testator, in these several particulars, the possible alterations of the property, or of the position of the parties, and to take his particular instructions in every one of these conceivable alterations; advising him, as may be necessary, as to the best and most practicable mode of carrying his wishes into effect.

It is too frequently the habit of solicitors to have a mere general outline furnished them by the testator of his will, and then, without any further consultation with him, to follow out in detail the various possible devolutions of the property according to their own scheme. Though this may be advantageously done in some circumstances, as a general rule it may be said that it is improper. It gives rise frequently to much discrepancy in wills, for a testator, it may be, having a scheme of his own which is full of specialties, the solicitor is too apt to fill up the details providing for ulterior circumstances, according to some general precedents which he may have by him, but which will be found not to work properly with the original scheme. Such a difficulty is not sufficiently met by submitting the will when entirely drawn to the consideration of the testator, for too frequently, in such a case, his mind will not be alive to his own intentions, but will be led away by that which, having been reduced into something of shape, appears to effect such intentions as he would have had if they were yet to be formed, but which, as he finds them ready formed for him, he does not much trouble himself to consider.

The more proper course then will be, as was before stated, for the testator, subject to the advice and suggestions of his solicitor, to state, step by step, his wishes, and by that means to preserve such an uniformity in the limitations and provisions as may be attainable. G. S. A.

MORAL OBLIGATION—HOW FAR A CONSIDERATION.

The doctrine that a moral obligation is a sufficient consideration to support an action of assumpsit is one which has been received with so much caution by the Courts in latter times, and adopted with so much readiness in earlier decisions, that between the two we have well-nigh lost all guide to the practical application of the rule. Let it be our present task to lay before the reader a concise, and we hope correct, summary of the decisions on the subject.

We may at once premise that a moral obligation is undoubtedly insufficient to raise an implied promise, and the reason is obvious and conclusive, for the very term "moral obligation" conveys the idea of a duty binding in conscience, though not for certain reasons enforceable in law; and how could any promise be implied in law, so as to compel a man to do or perform that which the law does not consider binding upon and enforceable against him? An implied promise must always arise from some liability enforceable at law per se, and from the existence of which the law at once infers the undertaking which is the groundwork of the action on an implied assumpsit. In a word, the implied promise is a convenient fiction invented for the purposes of suit, but which must be founded on a pre-existing enforceable duty.

We may also, without prejudice to our argument, admit that a moral obligation is not a sufficient consideration to support even an express promise, unless the party promising has received an actual pecuniary benefit, or been saved from an actual pecuniary loss, and that though a party may consider himself in conscience bound to perform a duty and make an express promise accordingly, yet this alone is not sufficient.

The true doctrine, then, we take to be as follows: and in the cases hereinafter quoted, we shall have occasion to shew in what respects they support, and how far they deviate from the true standard. "It is quite true," in the words of Lord Tenterden, in Littlefield v. Shee (2 B. & Ad.), that "the doctrine that a moral obligation is a sufficient consideration for a subsequent promise is one which should be received with some qualification;" but that qualification is well expressed in a note to an earlier case, viz. Wennall v. Adney (3 B. & P.), and which is referred to by the reporters of Littlefield v. Shee, with reference to Lord Tenterden's observation. In this note we find it thus observed:—"Lord Mansfield" (alluding to a decision of that eminent judge, to which we shall presently have occasion to refer) "appears to have used the term moral obligation, not as expressive of any vague or undefined claim, &c. but of those imperative duties which would be enforceable at law, were it not for some positive rule, which, with a view to general benefit, exempts the party in that particular instance from legal liability. On such duties, so exempted, an express promise operates to revive the liability and take away the exemption; an express promise, therefore, it should seem, can only revive a precedent good consideration, which might have been enforced at law through the medium of an implied promise had it not been suspended by some positive rule of law, but can give no original right of action if the obligation upon which it is founded never could have been enforced at law, though not barred by any legal maxim." We shall now take a critical survey of the several cases on this subject, first, however, taking into our consideration how far Mr. Selwyn's position (Sel. N. P. 10th ed. p. 51), that not a trace of the doctrine of moral obligation is to be found in the old cases, is tenable, and if we can shew that it was a recognised principle at the time of Lord Mansfield, and propounded then as no novelty, but as a well-known and received doctrine, we think we shall have somewhat advanced our case. We, indeed, admit that the term moral obligation is of recent date, but the principle is ancient. We have already adverted to the qualification with which Lord Mansfield's words in Hawkins v. Saunders (Cowp. 290), that "where a man is under a moral obligation, which no Court of law or equity can enforce, and promises, the honesty and rectitude of the thing is a consideration," must be received; and, indeed, this qualification is implied by an instance afterwards cited by his lordship in the same case, viz. that of an infant's liability to pay for things not necessaries supplied during infancy, on an express promise after full age. Now this case of an infant is one of moral obligation in the strictest sense, there being a duty enforceable at law, but for the intervention of a positive rule, viz. the non-liability of infants on their contracts for things not necessaries. Is there, then, no trace of such a moral obligation supporting an express promise in the old books? The case of Lampleigh v. Braithwait, reported in Hobart's Reports, p. 105, and decided in Michaelmas Term 13 Jac. 1, and cited by Mr. Selwyn, was as follows:—Anthony Lampleigh brought an assumpsit against Thomas Braithwait, and declared "that whereas the defendant had feloniously slain one Patrick Mahume; the defendant, after the said felony done, instantly required the plaintiff to labour and do his endeavours to obtain his pardon from the king; that plaintiff did so endeavour, and that afterwards defendant promised;" and it was agreed that mere voluntary courtesy will not have a consideration to uphold an assumpsit. This doctrine is quite consistent with our argument: and, as far as our judgment goes, the above case is an authority neither for nor against our position.

We shall next advert to the case of Rogers v. Stevens (2 T. R.), in which a party, defendant, objected that he had had no notice of the non-acceptance of the bill of exchange (a foreign bill) which was the subject of the action; and the judges held that a subsequent express promise to pay made the defendant liable, though he otherwise would not have been; Ashhurst, J. observing, "At all events, the other ground affords a satisfactory answer to this application." The defendant's subsequent acknowledgment, "that the bill must be paid," amounts in point of law to a promise that "it shall be paid," and does away with the necessity of considering the question relative to the want of notice.

Here, then, we have an imperative duty, which would be enforceable at law, were it not for a positive rule which, with a view to general benefit, exempted the party in that particular instance from legal liability. The express promise herein operated to revive the liability and take away the exemption; in a word, the moral obligation supported the subsequent express promise.

CHAP. III.

BEFORE WHOM TO BE SWORN.

27. All affidavits to be made or used in matters of bankruptcy, or under or by virtue of any statute relating to bankrupts, or of this Act, shall and may be sworn before the Court of Review, or before either of the subdivision courts in bankruptcy, or any commissioner, or the master, or any registrar or deputy registrar of the Court of Bankruptcy, or master in ordinary, or extraordinary, of the High Court of Chancery; or in Scotland or Ireland, before a magistrate of the county, city, town, or place where any such affidavit shall be sworn; or elsewhere, before a magistrate, and attested by a notary, or before a British minister, consul, or vice-consul. WITHIN WHAT TIME TO BE FILED.

28. By General Rules and Orders, Nov. 12, 1842, rule 23, if the affidavit for summoning a debtor under this Act shall not be filed within one calendar month after service of the particulars of demand and notice, the plaintiff (or creditor) shall not afterwards be at liberty to proceed without serving new particulars of demand and notice.

WHERE TO BE FILED.

29. By Lord Brougham's order, all affidavits and other documents directed to be filed in the Court of Bankruptcy are to be filed with the registrars of the court; and by General Rules and Orders, Nov. 12, 1842, rule 42, "all affidavits used in court shall be filed."

The creditor having now filed his affidavit, must apply to the Court in which it is filed, "to issue a summons in writing, in the form specified in the said schedule, calling upon such trader to appear before such Court, and stating in such summons the purpose for which such trader is called upon by such summons to appear, as hereinafter provided. (5 & 6 Vict. c. 122, s. 11.)

Given under my hand the day of , in the year of our Lord

(Signed) J K, Commissioner.

By General Rules and Orders, Nov. 12, 1842, rule 26, every summons of a debtor under this Act, shall describe the parties, in the same manner as they were described in the particulars of demand and notice (ante).

And by rule 27 of the General Rules and Orders, Nov. 12, 1842, every summons shall be indorsed with a notice as follows:—

Notice to the party summoned.

31. This summons is served upon you pursuant to the provisions of the 5th and 6th Vict. c. 122, intituled, "An Act for the Amendment of the Law of Bankruptcy," and is founded upon an affidavit of debt, which was filed in the Court of Bankruptcy in London (or the Court of Bankruptcy for the district, on the day of , 184 .

If you fail to appear in person to this summons, at the time and place within specified (having no lawful impediment made known to and proved to the satisfaction of the said Court at the said time, and allowed); and if you also fail, within fourteen days after service of this summons, or within such enlarged time as the said Court may grant, to pay, secure, or compound for the demand within mentioned, to the satisfaction of the summoning creditor, or enter into a bond with two sureties, to be approved of by the said Court, to pay such sum as shall be recovered in any action which shall have been brought, or shall thereafter be brought for recovery of the same, together with such costs as shall be given in such action, you will be deemed to have committed an act of bankruptcy on the fifteenth day after the service of this summons, provided a fiat in bankruptcy shall issue against you within two calendar months from the filing of the above-mentioned affidavit.

If you shall appear, and on appearance shall refuse to sign an admission of the said demand in the form required by the said Act, and shall not make a deposition on your oath, in the form required by the said Act, that you believe you have a good defence to such demand, and shall also fail, within fourteen days after service of this summons, or within such enlarged time as aforesaid, to pay, secure, or compound, as above mentioned, or to enter into such bond as above mentioned, the same consequence will follow as in the case first supposed, subject to the same proviso as regards the issuing a fiat in bankruptcy.

If you shall appear, and on appearance shall sign an admission of the said demand, and shall not, within fourteen days next after the filing of such admission, pay or tender, and offer to pay to the said creditor the amount of such demand, or secure or compound for the same to the satisfaction of such creditor, you will be deemed to have committed an act of bankruptcy on the fifteenth day after the filing of such admission, subject to the same proviso as before mentioned with regard to the issuing a fiat in bankruptcy.

If you shall appear, and on appearance shall sign an admission for part of the said demand, and shall not make a deposition on your oath, in form required by the said Act, that you believe you have a good defence to the residue, then if, as to the sum so admitted, you shall not, within fourteen days next after the filing of such admission, pay, or tender, and offer to pay, to the said creditor the sum so admitted, or secure or compound for the same to the satisfaction of such creditor, and as to the residue of such demand, shall not, within fourteen days from the service of this summons, or such enlarged time as may be granted by the said Court in that behalf, pay, secure, or compound for the same to the satisfaction of such creditor, or enter into a bond with two sureties, to be approved of by the Court, to pay such sum as shall be recovered in any action which shall have been brought, or shall thereafter be brought for the recovery of the same, together with such costs as shall be given in such action, you will be deemed to have committed an act of bankruptcy on the fifteenth day after service of this summons, subject to the same proviso as before mentioned with regard to the issuing the fiat in bankruptcy.

If you shall appear, and on appearance shall, as to the whole of the said demand, or part of it, make a deposition on your oath in the form required by the said Act, that you believe you have a good defence to the same, you will be entitled to a discharge from the summons.

You are moreover to observe that an admission made by you, after service of this summons, though signed out of court, may afterwards be filed in court, and will be as effectual as if you had appeared and signed it in court, provided there be present at the time of the signature an attorney of one of her Majesty's superior courts of law on your behalf, expressly named by you, and attending at your request, to inform you of the effect of such admission before it is signed by you; and provided also, that such attorney do subscribe his name to the admission as a witness, and in such attestation declare himself to be attending for you, and state therein that he subscribes as such attorney; and provided also, that the admission be in the following form:—

> I, the undersigned E F, of , in the county of , do hereby confess that I am indebted to A B, of , in the sum of
> (Signed) E. F.
> Dated this day of , 184
> Witness G H, attorney for the said E F, and subscribing witness to the execution hereof as such attorney.

And by General Rules and Orders, November 12, 1842, rule 28, it is further ordered, that every summons of a debtor under the said Act shall be indorsed with the name and place of residence (according to the form of specifying name and place directed by rule 20, ante) of the attorney actually suing out the same; and in case such attorney shall not be an attorney of the Court of Bankruptcy, then also with the name and residence (according to the same form) of the attorney of such court in whose name the summons shall be sued out; but in case no attorney shall be employed for the purpose, then with a memorandum, expressing that the same has been sued out by the summoning creditor "in person."

When the summons is issued, the creditor must make and the commissioner will sign the following

By General Rules and Orders, Nov. 12, 1842, rule 33, "any want of compliance, on the part of the plaintiff, with these rules and orders, in the particulars of demand and notice, and in the affidavit for summoning the defendant, and in the summons and service thereof, or in any or either of such matters, may be waived by the defendant, or if made known to and proved to the satisfaction of the Court, at the time required by the summons for the appearance of the defendant, shall be deemed and taken to be a good objection to requiring the defendant to state whether or not he admits the demand sworn to by the plaintiff, or any part thereof; and in such case, if want of compliance be not waived, the defendant shall be entitled to his discharge from the summons, and a memorandum of such discharge shall be indorsed on the summons."

CHAPTER II.

THE APPEARANCE TO THE SUMMONS, AND PROCEEDINGS THEREON.

34. Upon the appearance of any such trader so summoned as aforesaid, it shall be lawful for such Court to require such trader to state whether or not he admits the demand of such creditor, so sworn to as aforesaid, or any and what part thereof; and if such trader shall admit such demand, or any part thereof, to reduce such admission into writing, in the form specified in the schedule hereunto annexed, and such admission so reduced into writing, such trader is hereby required to sign, and the same is thereupon to be filed in such court: and it shall also be lawful for such Court to allow such trader, upon his said appearance, to make a deposition upon oath, in writing under his hand, to be filed in such court, in the form specified in the said schedule, that he verily believes he has a good defence to such demand, or to some and what part thereof. (5 & 6 Vict. c. 122, s. 12.)

By the above section the Court is empowered, on the appearance of the trader-debtor, to require him to state whether or not he admits his creditor's demand, or any and what part of it, and to reduce such admission into writing, and file it in court, after it has been signed by the trader. The Court has also power to allow the trader to make a deposition upon his oath, in writing, that he believes he has a good defence, either to the whole or to any and what part of the creditor's demand.

CONSEQUENCE OF CREDITOR'S NOT APPEARING.

35. If the debtor appears to the summons, but the creditor does not appear, then, by General Rules and Orders, Nov. 12, 1842, rule 31, it is ordered, "If the plaintiff (creditor) shall make default in appearance at the time appointed in that behalf, the defendant (debtor) shall be entitled to his discharge from the summons, and a memorandum of such discharge shall be indorsed on the summons.

IRREGULARITY IN THE CREDITOR'S PROCEEDINGS HOW TAKEN ADVANTAGE OF BY DEBTOR.

36. When both the creditor and debtor appear to the summons, if there has been any irregularity in the previous proceedings of the plaintiff (creditor), (vide ante), the debtor may either waive the objection, or take advantage of it before he is called upon to admit his creditor's demand; and if the debtor substantiate his objection as to the irregularity of the plaintiff's proceedings to the satisfaction of the Court, "he shall be entitled to his discharge from the summons, and a memorandum of such discharge shall be indorsed on the summons." (General Orders, 33.)

POWER OF COURT TO ENLARGE TIME FOR ADMISSION OF DEMAND.

37. By 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122, s. 16, it is enacted, "that it shall be lawful for such Court, upon reasonable cause shewn, to enlarge the time for calling upon such trader to state whether or not he admits such demand or any part thereof;" and by General Rules and Orders, Nov. 12, 1842, rule 34, "every application to enlarge the time for calling on the defendant to state whether or not he admits the demand, or any part thereof, shall be supported by affidavit."

DEPOSITION OF TRADER TO GOOD DEFENCE.

38. If the debtor take an objection to the plaintiff's proceedings, or, having taken it, fail to establish it to the satisfaction of the Court, or make no application for enlargement or adjournment, he is then called upon to state whether or not he admits his creditor's demand, or any part of it, or has a good defence to the whole demand, or any part of it. If he states that he has such defence to the demand, or any part of it, he must make an affidavit in the following form, given in schedule B, No. 2, of this statute:—

Deposition by Trader-Debtor of belief of good Answer to Creditor's Demand, or some part thereof.

If a trader who has been summoned under 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122, s. 11, does not file an affidavit as required by the said Act, he will not be entitled to have his summons dismissed. (Ex parte Lawrence and Co. 5 Law T. 203.)

This affidavit must be filed in the court, and has the effect of discharging the trader-debtor from the summons; for by General Rules and Orders, Nov. 12, 1842, rule 32, it is ordered that, "if the defendant shall appear at the time appointed in that behalf, and shall refuse to admit such demand, but shall, as to the whole of such demand, or part of it, make a deposition on oath in the form required by the said Act, that he believes he has a good defence to the same, the defendant shall be entitled to his discharge from the summons, and a memorandum of such discharge shall be indorsed on the summons.

Under this order the defendant, in order to entitle himself to be discharged upon filing an affidavit that he has a good defence to a part of the demand, must also admit the remainder of the demand.

In Ex parte Rea, re Rangecroft (5 Law T. 153), John Rangecroft, a trader, appeared to the summons, and filed a deposition that he had a good defence to a part of the demand. He then applied to the Court to dismiss the summons under the 32nd general order (suprà). This application was opposed by Rea's solicitor, on the ground that the deposition was not sufficient alone to entitle him to his discharge, as, under the 12th sec. 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122, he was bound to admit in his deposition that portion of the demand to which he had not deposed he had a good defence. The commissioner (Evans) held "that he must make the admission. The object of the Act is to afford the plaintiff conclusive evidence of his debt."

ADMISSION OF DEBT BY TRADER-DEBTOR.

39. If, on the other hand, the debtor is willing to admit the whole or part of his creditor's demand, he must make such admission in writing, and afterwards sign it. By Schedule B, No. 2, of this statute, the following form is given of—

Admission of Debt by Trader-Debtor.

Court of Bankruptcy, Basinghall-street.
(Or, at , in the county of .)
day of , A.D. .

Whereas I, the undersigned E F, of , am summoned to appear before this Honourable Court, for the purpose of stating, in manner prescribed by the statute in that case made and provided, whether or not I admit the demand of A B, of (who claims of me, the said E F, the sum of pounds for a debt), or any and what part thereof, or whether I verily believe that I have a good defence to the said demand, or to any, and what part thereof: Be it known, that I, the said E F, hereby confess that I am indebted to the said A B in the said sum of pounds (or in part of the said sum of pounds, that is to say in the sum of pounds).
(Signed) E F.

The above is the form of admission when made by the trader in court; but it may also be made out of court, for by 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122, s. 17, it is enacted, that "an admission of any debt made after such summons as aforesaid, and signed by any such trader elsewhere than before such Court, may be filed in such court, and shall be of the same force and effect, to all intents and purposes, as an admission signed by such trader so summoned as aforesaid, on his appearance in such court, provided there be present some attorney of one of her Majesty's superior courts of law on behalf of such trader, expressly named by him, and attending at his request, to inform him of the effect of such admission before the same is signed by such trader: and provided also, that such attorney do subscribe his name thereto as a witness to the due execution thereof, and in such attestation declare himself to be attorney for the said trader, and that such admission shall be made in the form of Schedule C, hereunto annexed."

40. Admission of Debt by Trader-Debtor signed out of court.

I, the undersigned E F, of , do hereby confess that I am indebted to A B, of in the sum of pounds.
(Signed) E F.
Dated this day of , A.D. .

REVIEW OF THE CASES DECIDED IN ALL THE COURTS OF COMMON LAW,

During Easter Term and Vacation, and Trinity Term and Vacation, 1845.

Rule to discontinue.—Where a rule has been obtained by the defendant with a stay of proceedings, the plaintiff cannot obtain a rule to discontinue, until the defendant's rule is disposed of. (Murray v. Silver, 5 Law T. 129; 14 L. J. 118, C. P.)

Rule to reply.—Where the defendant, after replication, has obtained leave to amend his plea, with a stay of proceedings and the usual permission to the plaintiff to reply de novo, he is entitled to rule; the plaintiff to reply as soon as he has delivered his amended plea. (Lampart v. Newton, 5 Law T. 76.)

Short notice of trial.—The term of "taking short notice of trial if necessary," does not entitle the plaintiff to neglect to give full notice of trial, if there is sufficient time for him to do so after issues joined. (Hitchings v. Farrow, 5 Law T. 178.)

Scire facias.—The Reg. Gen. H. T. 2 Wm. 4, 279, requiring a motion in term, or judge's order in vacation, to precede the issuing of a sci. fa. to revive a judgment, applies to all writs of sci. fa. when the judgment is more than ten years old; and an appearance entered without authority is no waiver of the objection that that rule has not been complied with. (Levi v. Levi, 5 Law T. 126.)

Smallness of damages.—A new trial is not usually granted, in actions of tort, on the ground of the damages being too small; and certainly will not be so, if the judge who tried the cause is not dissatisfied. (Gibbs v. Tunaley, 5 Law T. 197.) In Armytage v. Haley (1 Q. B. 917) a rule for new trial was granted in an action for an injury by the defendant's negligence, where the jury gave only a farthing damages, which Lord Denman said was no damages at all.

Staying proceedings.—In our Summary of Hilary Term (suprà, 4 L. T. 180), we noticed the singular case of Wait v. Simeon, in which a judge's order for stay of proceedings upon payment of the sum claimed, interest, and costs, was set aside upon the application of the defendant, after the discovery of evidence to support the plea of gaming, which had been put upon the record. The plaintiff, however, did not choose to go to trial, but instead, commenced another action in the Common Pleas upon an alleged agreement which formed the groundwork of the judge's order. The defendant then applied to stay the proceedings in this action, but the Court declined to interfere, as it purported to be brought upon an agreement distinct from, and independent of, the judge's order, and the fact that that order had been subsequently set aside did not necessarily affect the validity of the former agreement, or afford a reason for summary interference. (5 Law T. 95; 9 Jur. 172.) The plaintiff, we believe, subsequently obtained a verdict, but further proceedings will probably be taken next Term.

Writ of summons.—Even this subject is not yet exhausted, the ever-varying changes of circumstances giving rise to new points as to what is a compliance with the statute. In Walker v. Perkins, (5 Law T. 99; 14 L. J. 214, Q. B.) the writ was at the suit of Henry Walker and Co. with a notice that, in default of appearance being entered, the said Henry Walker and Co. would enter the appearance. The writ was indorsed, "the plaintiff claims 20*l.* 1s." Coleridge, J. (sitting in the Bail Court) rescinded an order of Rolfe, B. setting aside the above writ, and held that the writ was good, inasmuch as the Court could not infer that there were more plaintiffs than one. A writ of summons served in Middlesex, describing the defendant as "of Wellington, in the county of Salop, but now in the county of Middlesex," is irregular, as it does not give the place in the county of Middlesex where the defendant is supposed to be. (Downes v. Garbett, 5 Law T. 98; 14 L. J. 216.) The probable fate of many railway schemes renders any decision relating to this new branch of practice useful. Such is Evans v. Drogheda Railway Company (5 Law T. 97; 14 L. J. 214). There an Act for making a railway from Dublin to Drogheda enacted, that service of a writ upon a secretary of the company, or at the company's office, or by delivering it to some inmate at such office, or at the abode of the secretary, or in case the same respectively should not be found or known, then service on any other agent of the company, or on any one director of the said company, should be deemed a good service. The company had an office in Dublin; a writ had been served upon a director in London, and an appearance subsequently entered, declaration filed, and judgment signed; but the Court of Exchequer set this judgment aside, as there could be no service under the Act except in Ireland. If an appearance has been irregularly entered by the plaintiff, the motion should be to set aside the appearance, and not the declaration. (Brooks v. Roberts, 5 Law T. 128; 14 L. J. 168, C. P.)

Rennie v. Bruce (5 Law T.; 14 L. J. 207, Q.B.) as a peculiar case, must here be noticed. The facts were, that the defendant was arrested under a writ of capias, the copy served of which contained no direction to the sheriff, and no day or year in the teste. The defendant was served with a copy of the writ of summons, by which the action was commenced, directed to the defendant in the wrong county, and tested in 1840, but which was not served until 1844. On application to discharge the defendant out of custody, for irregularity, it was held that it was not necessary to apply to set aside the writs or copies, and that the grounds of the irregularity need not be stated in the rule. It was further held, that it was necessary that a summons should have issued before proceeding to the arrest, under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 5; and the writ of summons and copy being defective, the Court had no power to render them valid by amendment, as there was nothing by which to amend the writ itself; and even if the Court had power to deal with the copy, it could only be by permitting a fresh copy to be served, which would not remedy the defect in the original service. It should be borne in mind, however, that the affidavit for a capias may be made before writ issued, and in that case need not be entitled. (Schletter v. Cohen, 7 M. & W. 389; 9 D. P. C. 277.)

SLANDER.

Privileged communication.—The legal rules as to slander coincide in a very great degree with what morality would dictate, and it would be well if the liabilities which parties incur by circulating slanderous reports were more accurately known by those who indulge in this amusement. To repeat even a privileged communication may in many cases expose the person to an action (Twogood v. Spyring, 1 C. M. & R. 181), and, in a case that occurred in Easter Term, the Court of Queen's Bench laid down the correct and broad principle, that the originator of a slanderous report is not privileged in repeating the slander in answer to any questions from the person slandered. In Lord Denman's words, a person cannot by uttering a slander once gain the privilege of uttering it again. (Griffiths v. Lewis, 5 Law T. 52, 9 Jur. 370.) He also threw out a practical observation which should always be followed. It is the constant practice, said his lordship, for persons who have been slandered to take with them some friend, and ask the person who uttered the words whether he used the words, and whether he will abide by them. Indeed, an action for establishing a person's character does not stand well without such a previous inquiry.

STAMP.

Account stated.—A memorandum—"I owe J. G. the sum of two hundred pounds, value received," does not require a stamp. (Gould v. Coombs, 5 Law T. 93. 9 Jur. 494.) The first count in the declaration was upon a promissory note, and it appeared at the trial that the note had been altered by the addition of the name of another maker. The Court of Common Pleas declined to give an opinion as to the effect of this alteration upon the note, but held, that inasmuch as the I O U was made before the alteration, the note was admissible to shew the circumstances under which the I O U was given. (Ibid.)

Agreement.—Where an agreement which imposes penalties is added to a lease, it requires a separate stamp, though connected with and ancillary to the demise. Thus, by an agreement purporting to be made on the 31st January between plaintiff and J. W.; but signed on the 1st of February by defendant J. W. and plaintiff; plaintiff let a public-house to J. W.; J. W. agreed to buy from plaintiff all the liquor which should be sold on the premises; defendant agreed to hold himself responsible for any amount of money which might become due from J. W. to plaintiff, viz. to the amount of 36*l.* It was held that this was a guarantee requiring a stamp. (Wharton v. Walton, 5 Law T. 171, 9 Jur. 638.) Chadwicke v. Clarke, (5 Law T. 174) should also be noted. It shows that a document, if intended to be an agreement, must be stamped, although unsigned.

Balance of account.—The case most useful in respect of its frequent occurrence, is Burt v. Leigh (5 Law T. 176), where the Court of Exchequer held that a receipt for "2*l.* 2s. being the balance account up to this day," is within the meaning of the schedule of 55 Geo. 3, c. 184, relating to balance of account, and requires a 10s. stamp. At Nisi Prius it had been held not to require a stamp. (See 1 Car. & K. 611.)

Indictment.—We may here mention that a document, inadmissible for want of a stamp, may still form the subject of a larceny, if it be described as a piece of paper; thus, on an indictment for stealing a banker's cheque, described in another count as a piece of paper, value one penny, the prisoner was convicted on the latter count, although, as a cheque, the instrument could not be received in evidence for want of a stamp. (Reg. v. Perry, 5 Law T. 150.)

Indorsement on deed.—A statement, indorsed on a mortgage-deed by the mortgagee, from which it appears that the consideration-money was partly advanced by himself, and partly by another person, does not make it necessary, for the admission of the deed in evidence, that it should bear a stamp for each sum instead of one stamp only on the aggregate sum. (Doe dem. Downe v. Gorier, 5 Law T. 37.) The reason is, we apprehend, that the indorsement is not part of the deed; and accordingly, upon oyer, the defendant would not be entitled to have a copy of it. (Smith v. Goldworthy, 1 D. N. S. 288.) But an indorsement upon the back of a promissory note, shewing the nature of the advance, and the time from which interest is to be paid, requires an agreement stamp. (Cholmondley v. Daley, 5 Law T. 267.)

TITHES.

Award of commissioners.—We will only refer here to the important case of Reg. v. Tithe Commissioners (5 Law T. 329), upon the form of an award under the 7 Wm. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 69, in which numerous points were decided, and amongst them that the decision of Ystradgunlais (13 L. J. 287) was wrong as to the exclusion of 7 Wm. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 69. A ludicrous instance of the systematic blundering of our legislature is afforded by these Acts, for there can be little doubt that the clause as to the effect of certiorari was drawn by a person wholly ignorant of the nature of that writ. It conferred the strange power upon the Court of entering into the merits of a question of boundary, and was supposed to have been intended to deprive them of the power of examining the form of the award. We cannot refrain from noticing instances of this kind, as the evil inflicted upon the whole community, and the disgrace brought upon our judicial system by blunders of the statute-book, are most serious. We suspect the Small Debts Act will be no exception.

Decision of commissioner.—Where exemption from tithes is claimed by reason of several moduses, if the yearly value of the tithes in respect of the land covered by each modus does not exceed 20*l*. the decision of the Tithe Commissioner thereon is final, although the aggregate value of the tithes in respect of the land covered by all the moduses may exceed 20*l*. (Tomlinson v. Bourhey, 5 Law T. 173.)

WARRANTS OF ATTORNEY.

Green v. Wood (14 L. J. 217, Q. B.; 5 Law T. 72) is another illustration of the no-meaning of Acts of Parliament. Under the 3 Geo. 4, c. 39, s. 2, it has been customary to file warrants of attorney, and also to sign judgment within twenty-one days; but as soon as, from an accidental omission to file, the point was raised as to the necessity of doing so, it was discovered that the statute, taken literally, was satisfied by judgment being signed, without any execution issued or any filing at all, and that the statute as it is was no doubt a mistake, but that the Court could not supply what had been intended by the Legislature. So that, in fact, what no one would think of omitting to do, viz. signing judgment within twenty-one days, renders any warrant of attorney valid against assignees. Nor is it a fatal defect that a defeasance contains an erroneous statement as to the amount due from the bankrupt, as suggested in Chitty's Archb. 683 (Robinson v. Robinson, 5 Law T. 172.)

WRIT OF TRIAL.

Amount indorsed must be less than 20l.—We ventured to doubt the correctness of Frodsham v. Round (4 D. P. C. 569), where the indorsement upon a writ was allowed to be amended by reducing it to 20*l*. to bring it within the Writ of Trial Act (suprà, vol. 2, p. 241); and that our view was quite right is shewn by the recent cases of Gosling v. Cotterell (5 Law T. 761; Hitchings v. Farrow ibid. 178). LEADING CASES.—No. VIII.

SURPLICE v. FARNSWORTH.

(8 Scott, N. R. 307.)

Liability of tenant to payment of rent where there has been no beneficial occupation of the demised premises.

Whether or not a tenant is relieved from his liability in respect of rent, by reason of the demised premises being rendered uninhabitable by fire, tempest, unavoidable accident, or by the landlord's default in doing the necessary repairs, is a question not merely interesting to the legal reader, but of manifest importance to very many of the community at large. This question we now propose to consider in a manner which may be, as far as the prescribed limits will allow, commensurate with its interest and practical importance.

It is well known, as a general rule, that a tenant holding under a lease can only quit the demised premises at the expiration of the term therein agreed upon, and that a yearly tenant, by verbal agreement, must determine the tenancy by a regular notice to quit at that quarter, or other period of the year, at which he originally became tenant of the premises. "Where there is a tenancy from year to year subsisting, it can only be put an end to by a notice to quit, which may be given by either party, and must be given six months previously to the expiration of the current year of tenancy, so as to expire at the same period of the year in which the tenant entered upon the premises. This rule is to be invariably followed in all cases except where there is some special agreement between the parties to a different effect, or it would seem where a particular local custom intervenes." (Woodfall, L. & T. 5th ed. 250.)

Where the tenancy is for a less period than a year, the general rule requiring six months' notice of course does not apply, ex. gr. to determine a monthly or weekly taking, a month's or week's notice will be sufficient. (Doe dem Parry v. Hasell, 1 Esp. 94; Doe dem. Campbell v. Scott, 6 Bing. 362.) "Where," it has been observed, "a lease is determinable on a certain event, or at a particular period, no notice to quit is necessary, because both parties are equally apprised of the determination of the term. If there be a lease for a year, and by consent of both parties the tenant continue in possession afterwards, the law implies a tacit renovation of the contract; they are supposed to have renewed the old agreement, which was to hold for a year. But then it is necessary for the sake of convenience, that if either party should be inclined to change his mind, he should give the other half a year's notice before the expiration of the next or any following year. As to the case of lodgings, that depends on a particular contract, and is an exception to the general rule. The agreement between the parties may be for a month or less time, and there to be sure much shorter notice would be sufficient, where the tenant has held over the time agreed upon, than in the other case." (Per Lord Mansfield, C. J. Right d. Flower v. Darby, 1 T. R. 162.) The rule then, with respect to the necessity of giving due notice to quit, admits of easy application in ordinary cases; but there are exceptions to this rule, under peculiar circumstances, which we propose, in the course of these remarks to consider somewhat minutely. It seems quite clear, that where a lessee covenants to pay rent, he will be bound by that covenant, notwithstanding any injury which may happen to the demised premises; for where the party, by his own contract, creates a duty or charge upon himself, he is bound to make it good, if he may, notwithstanding any accident by inevitable necessity, because he might have provided against it by his contract. (Paradine v. Jane, Aleyn R. 27, cited per Lord Ellenborough, C. J. Atkinson v. Ritchie, 10 East, 533.) The best course for the tenant to take in order to free himself from liability, would perhaps be to tender to his landlord an abandonment of his lease, upon the refusal or neglect of the latter to rebuild. That such a course may be taken by the tenant seems to result from the case of Pindar v. Ainsley (cited 1 T. R. 312), which was an action of ejectment by the tenant against his landlord, to recover possession of some houses which had been burned down during the term, and had been rebuilt by the landlord. The lease contained an express covenant on the part of the tenant to pay rent, but he had paid none subsequent to the date of the fire. Lord Mansfield, before whom the cause was tried, said, "The consequence of the house being burnt down is, that the landlord is not obliged to rebuild, but the tenant is obliged to pay the rent during the whole term;" and his lordship left it to the jury to say whether it was not to be presumed that the tenant had abandoned the lease at the time of the fire, and accordingly the defendant had a verdict. In cases, likewise, where no special contract has been entered into by the parties, the tenant will continue liable to the payment of rent until the tenancy has been regularly determined, although in point of fact he has held during the latter period of the tenancy no beneficial enjoyment of the demised premises. Re Izon v. Gorbon (5 Bing. N.C. 501), recognized Arden v. Pullen (10 M. & W. 321), the defendants occupied as tenants from year to year a second floor, which during their occupation was consumed by an accidental fire. It was held that, notwithstanding the destruction of the premises, they were liable to an action for use and occupation for the period which elapsed between the fire and the regular determination of their tenancy. "If," observed Tindal, C. J. delivering the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas in this case, "there had been an agreement in writing between the parties for a term of years, no question could have been made but that the term of years still existed; and a tenancy from year to year, until it is determined by a notice to quit, is, as to its legal character and consequences, the same as a term for years. Upon the facts stated in this case, it must stand admitted that the tenancy was not determined by any regular notice to quit; and the case of Baker v. Holtpzaffell (4 Taunt. 45) is a direct authority that a tenancy for a term under an agreement, not being an instrument under seal, is not determined by a fire during the continuance of the tenancy." Besides the question as to the liability or non-liability of the tenant for rent, another point which it is important to advert to was decided in Izon v. Gorton, viz. that the action for "use and occupation" would well lie under the circumstances of that case. Now this count for use and occupation is founded on the statute 11 Geo. 2, c. 19, s. 14, which enacts that "it shall be lawful for a landlord, where the agreement is not by deed, to recover a reasonable satisfaction for the lands, tenements, or hereditaments held or occupied by the defendant, in an action on the case, for the use and occupation of what was so held or enjoyed; and if, in evidence on the trial of such action, any parol demise, or any agreement (not being by deed) whereon a certain rent is reserved, shall appear, the plaintiff shall not therefore be nonsuited, but may make use thereof as an evidence of the quantum of the damages to be recovered." It may hardly be necessary to observe that the action of assumpsit, which is included in the general class of actions on the case, is the remedy provided by the above section, and that the object of the statute was to obviate and avoid the difficulties of suing on the demise, according to which only could the landlord previously recover his rent. (Per Holroyd, J. Hall v. Burgess, 5 B. & C. 333.) It was argued in Izon v. Gorton that the plaintiff could only recover on the count for use and occupation where there had been an occupation in fact or a use; and that, in order to raise the question of liability under the given circumstances, the plaintiff ought to have declared specially against the defendants as tenants from year to year; it was, however, decided that the action was maintainable if there be an actual holding, and if the power to occupy and enjoy is given by the landlord to the tenant so far as depends on the landlord. In Surplice v. Farnsworth (8 Scott, N.R. 307), both the propositions laid down in Izon v. Gorbon were fully recognised and established. This was assumpsit for use and occupation of certain premises held under a parol agreement. It was proved at the trial that the repairs had always been done by or at the charge of the landlord; and assuming, therefore, that there was a specific agreement, on the landlord's part, to do the repairs during the term, the question arose whether, on the breach of that agreement, the tenants became entitled to quit without notice, the premises being in an untenantable state, and the defendants consequently not having any actual beneficial enjoyment of them. This question was decided by the Court of Common Pleas in the negative. "Taking it," observed Tindal, C. J. "that there was an agreement on the landlord's part to do the repairs during the term, there is nothing to shew this to be a condition as well as an agreement. It therefore seems to me, that whatever remedy the tenants may have against the landlord for his breach of contract, the relation of landlord and tenant still subsists;" and Cresswell, J. remarked as follows:—"The action for use and occupation is founded upon an agreement to hold for a term not yet expired. It has been contended, on the part of the defendants, that the agreement here has been put an end to by the failure of the landlord to perform a condition on his part. Now it seems to be admitted, that where the tenancy is by deed, no such condition as is suggested can be implied. I do not see why we should import such a condition into a parol demise rather than into a demise by deed. Indeed, it is the less necessary, seeing that in the former case the tenant has the remedy in his own hands. The cases referred to are clear authorities to shew that use and occupation is maintainable, though there has not been, and could not be, actual beneficial occupation." The cases to which the learned judge here more particularly alludes are those of Sutton v. Temple (12 M. & W. 52), and Hart v. Windsor (12 M. & W. 68). In the former of these it was held that, on a demise of the use and vesture of land (as the herbage of a field) for a specific term at a certain rent, there is no implied obligation on the part of the lessor that the land shall be fit for the purpose for which it is taken; and in the latter, the Court held that there is no implied warranty on a lease of a house or of land that it is or shall be reasonably fit for habitation, occupation, or cultivation and further, that there is no contract, still less a condition implied by law, on the demise of real property only, that it is fit for the purpose for which it is let. As we wish on this occasion to confine our attention to the liability of the tenant of a dwelling-house, and to exclude from consideration that of the occupier of land generally, we shall content ourselves with citing one passage from the judgment in Hart v. Windsor, which bears directly on our present subject. "Though," observes Parke, B. "in the case of a dwelling-house taken for habitation there is no apparent injustice in inferring a contract of this nature (viz. that it is fit for habitation and tenantable), the same rule must apply to land taken for other purposes—for building upon or for cultivation; and there would be no limit to the inconvenience which would ensue. It is much better to leave the parties in every case to protect their interests themselves by proper stipulations; and if they really mean a lease to be void by reason of any unfitness in the subject for the purpose intended, they should express that meaning." It is certainly difficult to reconcile in a satisfactory manner the decision in Smith v. Marrable (11 M. & W. 5), with the two cases just cited, and with the rule of law as laid down by Parke, B. in the preceding passage; it was there held that a person who lets a ready-furnished house at a weekly rent, does so under the implied condition or obligation that the house is in a fit state to be inhabited; and the only mode of upholding this case, after the subsequent decisions, is, by assuming it as a true proposition that a party engaging to take a ready-furnished house does so on the implied contract that the house and furniture shall be fit for immediate occupation. In Smith v. Marrable the house was infested with bugs, and consequently uninhabitable, and the tenant having accordingly quitted without notice, gave the above fact in evidence under non assumpsit, in an action brought against him for use and occupation, and it was held that the defence was valid, and might be given in evidence under the above plea. Whether this decision be maintainable or not, it seems, at all events, merely to have extended the application of a principle which had been recognised as correct in several cases previously decided at Nisi Prius, and which, we apprehend, is perfectly consistent with the dictates of common sense, viz. that a yearly tenant will be justified in quitting where the non-repair of the premises by the default of the landlord is productive of immediate danger to life, or where the existence of a nuisance, which it is the duty of the landlord to abate, produces a similar consequence. The authorities on this subject will be found collected in Woodfall's Landlord and Tenant, 5th edit. pp. 308, 652, and receive additional weight from the remarks of Coltman, J. in 8 Scott, N. R. 316. If the law be as here suggested, the tenant who has thus been compelled to quit will not be liable to the payment of rent after he has ceased to occupy; and this proposition is quite in accordance with the law as laid down by Pothier in his treatise on the Contrat de Louage, part iii. chap. i. art. 2, s. 2. "If," he observes, "a tenant is obliged to quit the demised premises before the expiration of the term, because the house, by reason of its ruinous state, is likely to fall, the rent will cease to run, and the tenant will be free from liability from the day on which he quitted the premises." In order to justify the tenant in quitting, he must, according to Pothier, have reasonable grounds for apprehending danger, in which case he will be discharged from liability, if the landlord does not provide him with other accommodation. We may further observe, that the principle here advocated is by no means irreconcileable with the case of Izon v. Gorton above cited, which must certainly be considered as a binding authority. In that case Tindal, C. J. concludes his judgment thus:—"The cases in which the tenant has been allowed to withdraw himself from the tenancy, and to refuse payment of rent, will be found to be cases where there has been either error or fraudulent misdescription of the premises which were the subject of the letting, or where the premises have been found to be uninhabitable by the wrongful act or default of the landlord himself." This passage is expressly recognised in Arden v. Pullen, suprà, where, moreover, one of the Nisi Prius cases above alluded to (Collins v. Barrow, Mood. & Rob. 112) is distinguished and held maintainable upon this very ground, viz. that there was some wrongful act or default on the part of the landlord.

The case of Arden v. Pullen (10 M. & W. 321) will not be found to be opposed to the view which we have taken of this question, because, although the tenant was there held liable to payment of the rent, notwithstanding he had quitted on account of the dangerous state of the house under demise to him, it must be remarked that he held under a written agreement, in itself perfectly good and valid, and that we have been latterly considering the law applicable to a tenancy from year to year under a verbal agreement only. If there be a demise in writing, such writing ought to contain an express stipulation that the rent shall cease if, by non-repair or other default of the landlord, by fire or unavoidable accident, the premises are rendered uninhabitable. A note of Surplice v. Farnsworth may be made in Woodfall's Landlord and Tenant, 5th ed. 307.

LEGAL INTELLIGENCE.

ACCIDENT TO MR. JUSTICE MAULE.—On Tuesday evening, between 8 and 9 o'clock, having liberated himself from a tedious day's business at St. Mary's Hall, Mr. Justice Maule, while passing down the stairs from the magistrates' room, as he approached the bottom, met with a sudden and rather violent fall, caused by his foot slipping. An officer in attendance immediately raised his lordship, who was at first considerably alarmed by the shock he had received, from the awkward position in which he fell. Happily, however, he sustained no serious hurt, and soon recovered his self-possession, shortly afterwards proceeding to Warwick for the night. The fall was purely accidental, the staircase and passages being well lighted at the time it occurred. We understand that, on the learned judge's alighting at the official lodgings at Warwick, he found them fireless and cheerless, and altogether presenting a very "barrack-like" appearance, partly in consequence of his arrival a day earlier than expected.—Coventry Herald.

BANKRUPTCY COURT, LIVERPOOL.—CHARGES OF THE OFFICIAL ASSIGNEES.—On Wednesday, the 12th inst. in the case of Messrs. Brocklehurst, Dirks, and Co.'s bankruptcy, Mr. Lowndes, solicitor, brought before the notice of Mr. Serjeant Ludlow a question as to the charges made by the official assignees of the Court of Bankruptcy for receiving the proceeds on the sale of bankrupts' property. In the case before the Court the official assignee had received a sum of about 2,800*l.* in one payment, and he claimed to break this into parts, and to charge a graduated scale of commission upon the parts of this sum so broken; namely, 2½ per cent. on the first 500*l.*; 1 per cent. on the next 1,000*l.*; and ½ per cent. on the remainder. This Mr. Lowndes contended was indefeasible in principle; that the amount received, coming to the official assignee in one sum, ought to have one uniform commission, as it could not be said that there was more difficulty in the receipt of one part than any other of the same sum; that the rule which might fairly apply to the collection of outstanding debts of differing amount was not applicable to the proceeds of sale. He then referred to a case lately reported, from a note on which it appeared that the commission ought to be 1 per cent. on collections like the present, and 2 per cent. on the sum remaining for division. But the official assignees then present declared that this scale of remuneration had been found quite inadequate, and had been long exploded. Mr. Lowndes went on to observe, that it was exceedingly desirable some fixed principle should be adopted, and things put on a different footing, as if such expenses are paid unwillingly, it must tend to lessen the amount of business. The commissioner observed that the principle, he believed, was, in all ordinary cases, to charge according to the amount of trouble given to the official assignee. Mr. Turner, Mr. Cazenove, and Mr. Morgan, official assignees, were present, and the two first-named gentlemen spoke of the difficulties which were sometimes encountered in collecting an insolvent's accounts, and stated that the charges were not unreasonable. The Commissioner remarked that the situations of official assignees were those of great responsibility and trust; that they had to give bonds to a large amount in London, which bonds he knew, from his own personal knowledge, were closely scrutinised by the Lord Chancellor, and they were not permitted to carry on any other business; therefore gentlemen holding such offices ought to be properly remunerated; although he had a decided objection to any thing in the shape of what might be considered an exorbitant demand. Allusion had been made to the charges allowed by commissioners of other courts; he did not consider himself bound by them. At all events, although they might be a guide, they could not be a fetter. It did not appear to him that any general scale for all purposes would answer, and he believed the charges varied in all the Bankruptcy Courts. Mr. Follett, the official assignee of the Bankruptcy Court, in London, happening to be present, gave his opinion, which was to the effect that the charge must depend in a great measure on the sum collected; he believed that in most of the courts it was charged in parts, as Mr. Turner had done it; the matter, however, rested with the commissioner. A long discussion then ensued, from which it appeared the more general opinion was that the present scale was not a good one. Mr. Turner expressed his willingness to meet the parties in the case before them in any way that might be considered desirable. The Commissioner thought it desirable that an arrangement should be come to between the parties themselves. Mr. Turner, he felt assured, would do what was necessary. He did not consider himself in a position to lay down any rule on the subject; but if a case were submitted to him, he should have no objection to consider it on its own merits. The parties then retired, and an arrangement was, we understand, effected.

PERQUISITES OF THE COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.—A return recently printed for the use of members of Parliament shews that the gross amount of fees received by the Senior Master of the Court of Common Pleas, at Westminster, under the Acts 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, from the date of the passing of that Act (for registering judgments, decrees, &c. at 5s. each, and for searches, at 1s. each), was altogether in 1838, 244*l.*; in 1839, 785*l.*; in 1840, 914*l.*; in 1841, 1,310*l.*; in 1842, 1,293*l.*; in 1843, 1,319*l.*; and in 1844, 1,366*l.* The return of the disbursements out of these fees amounted in 1844 to 549*l.* The gross amount of fees received under the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 11, for registering lites pendentes, re-registering judgments, &c. amounted in 1839 to 25*l.*; in 1840, to 222*l.*; in 1841, to 436*l.*; in 1842, to 318*l.*; in 1843, to 315*l.*; and in 1844, to 336*l.* The gross amount of fees received by the officer appointed in the Court of Common Pleas, under the Act 3 & 4 Wm. 4, c. 74, for registering the certificates of the acknowledgment of deeds by married women, &c. from the date of the passing of that Act, was in 1834, 2,262*l.*; in 1835, 2,032*l.*; in 1836, 2,182*l.*; in 1837, 2,360*l.*; in 1838, 2,520*l.*; in 1839, 2,508*l.*; in 1840, 2,548*l.*; in 1841, 2,396*l.*; in 1842, 2,424*l.*; in 1843, 2,243*l.*; and in 1844, 2,329*l.* The disbursements paid out of the said fees for rent, clerks, &c. amounted in 1834 to 350*l.*; in 1835, to 321*l.*; in 1836, to 332*l.*; in 1837, to 357*l.*; in 1838, to 398*l.*; in 1839, to 415*l.*; in 1840, to 460*l.*; in 1841, to 467*l.*; in 1842, to 670*l.*; in 1843, to 464*l.*; in 1844, to 471*l.*

GAMBLING TRANSACTIONS.—By the new Act concerning games and wagers, it is provided that every person who shall by any fraud or unlawful device or ill practice in playing at or with cards, dice, tables, or other games, or in bearing a part in the stakes, wagers, or adventures, or in betting on the sides or hands of them that do play; or in wagering on the event of any game, sport, pastime, or exercise, win from any other person to himself or any other or others, any sum of money or valuable thing, shall be deemed guilty of obtaining such money or valuable thing from such other person by a false pretence, with intent to cheat or defraud such person of the same; and being convicted thereof, shall be punished accordingly. Wagers are not to be recoverable by law, but the enactment is not to apply to any subscription, or contribution, or agreement to be awarded to the winner or winners of any lawful game, sport, pastime, or exercise. In future, proceedings under feigned issues are to be abolished, and matters tried under a writ of summons. Proceedings under this Act are not to be commenced without a month's notice, and are to be brought within three months of the alleged offence of omission or commission.

THE LATE MR. ADOLPHUS.—It is somewhat remarkable that so many of our great lawyers die without leaving a will; as is the case with this distinguished barrister, whose personal effects have been administered to under 5,000*l*.

THE JUDGESHIPS UNDER THE NEW LOCAL COURT ACT.—A large part of both branches of the Profession is in commotion regarding the election of judges for the enlarged local courts. In Westminster, where there is a vacancy to be filled by the commissioners of the court, there are 150 candidates, including barristers as well as solicitors. We observe that rather large fees are to be paid on trials, so that if the causes are numerous the emoluments will be considerable.

FEES IN CRIMINAL MATTERS.—By an Act of last session, persons charged with felony or misdemeanour, against whom no bill shall be found, or who shall be acquitted, are in no case to be charged with any fees. The Act is the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 91, which was passed to explain and amend the 55 Geo. 3, c. 50.

WILL OF THE LATE SIR WILLIAM FOLLETT.—Probate of the will of Sir William Webb Follett, late of the Inner Temple, London, and of Park-street, Westminster, Knt. was granted on the 2nd instant to his brothers, Robert Bayly Follett, Brent Spencer Follett, and John Follett, esqrs. and to his brother-in-law, Edward Gifford, esq. the executors; they are also appointed guardians to the children. The testator devises his real estates to his executors, in trust for his eldest son George, and on failure of issue, to his other sons and their issue male. He bequeaths to Lady Follett 2,500*l*. a year, and a legacy of 1,000*l*. for immediate use; to his sister, Mrs. Synge, 200*l*. a year, and a legacy of 500*l*.; to his sister, Mrs. Bright, 3,000*l*. for her own use, and to her husband, Dr. Bright, 500*l*.; to the four sisters of his wife, 1,000*l*. each; and legacies to his nephews, and a year's wages to his servants. He leaves his law books to his brother Brent Spencer Follett, his brother Robert Bayly Follett first making a selection for his own use; and to his brother Robert the watch he usually wore; he devises to his brother John the messuage, &c. at Topsham; and bequeaths to each of his said three brothers a legacy of 1,500*l*. He bequeaths to Lady Follett the carriages, horses, and all the household furniture, &c. for her life, but expresses a wish that she should give to his son inheriting the real estate such of the plate as was received by him as presents. The residue of his personal estate (the sworn under 160,000*l*.) he leaves to be divided among all his children. The will is dated July 11, 1844, and is of some length, the last sheet, in his own handwriting, containing several bequests. Sir William died on the 28th of June, in his 47th year.—Morning Post.

THE LATE MR. JOSEPH SOMES.—The will of this extensive shipowner has been proved by the executors, Messrs. J. and F. Somes, the nephews, and Thomas Collyer and Edward Saxton. The personal estate is sworn under 500,000*l*. He bequeaths a sum of 70,000*l*. to be invested for the benefit of his wife, 30,000*l*. part thereof, to be at her own disposal. It is the testator's particular wish that she should not re-marry within two years. He bequeaths to his daughter, Mrs. Collyer, 70,000*l*. and to her children at her decease, and to Mr. T. Collyer, 10,000*l*. He bequeaths to his sister, Mrs. Harriet Docker, 6,000*l*. and to her daughter Harriet, at her decease; and leaves to his said niece, Harriet Docker, a legacy of 10,000*l*. To his sister, Mrs. Sarah Briant, 15,000*l*. 10,000*l*. at her death to her daughter Harriet, and 5,000*l*. to her son William; to his sister, Mrs. Ellen Holloway, 20,000*l*. and at her decease to her children; a legacy to her daughter Ellen. He bequeaths many other legacies to his relatives. He leaves to his wife's mother, Mrs. Saxton, 4,000*l*. and 500*l*. to each of his executors. The residue being undisposed of, the widow and daughter take the same under the statute for distribution of intestates' estates. The will, which is in draft, is in the deceased's handwriting, signed by him, and dated 22nd January, 1844, but was not executed until the day of his death, the 25th of June last. It was intended as instructions, and sent to his solicitor as a groundwork for his will, from which a draft was prepared and shewn to deceased, but owing to his sudden illness there was no time to have it fairly copied. The testator, on the day on which he died, the 25th, made a cross below his signature thereto, and acknowledged the said will or instructions to be his last will in the presence of his physician, H. J. Little, M.D. and Norman M'Leod.—Morning Post.

PROCEEDINGS OF LAW SOCIETIES.

THE INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY.

FROM the Annual Report of the Council of the Incorporated Law Society, we are enabled to state some of the proceedings which have taken place during the past year, for promoting as well the objects of the society as the interests of the Profession.

Among other subjects, the council have bestowed their best attention on the several Bills before Parliament affecting the law and the practice of the courts, and have taken such steps relative thereto as they deemed expedient for the interests of the Profession.

Numerous cases of alleged mal-practice have been brought to the notice of the council: of accountants and other unqualified persons assuming to act in part of the usual business of attorneys; of attorneys practising without having obtained their annual certificates; and of others who were alleged to have neglected their client's interests, or otherwise have failed to discharge their duty. In all these cases the council have taken such measures as the circumstances appeared to require.

The applications for the renewal of certificates by attorneys who have ceased to practise, have each Term been carefully watched, and opposed where the circumstances seemed to the council to require their interference.

In several instances the council have felt it their duty to oppose applications for examination and admission, and have successfully done so.

The council have also had under their consideration various matters affecting the practice of solicitors and the convenient despatch of business. Amongst other subjects they have attended to the new rule laid down by the present Registrar of Deeds in Middlesex, requiring one of the witnesses to the memorial to be an attesting witness to the execution of the deed by a granting party, on which subject the council were prepared to adopt such measures as might be necessary; but they are given to understand that the registrar has now consented to return to the old and convenient practice of registering a deed on a memorial executed by any one of the parties.

The objectionable nature of the Lease for a Year Stamp has also been considered, and a communication made to the authorities thereon: and the council ...son to believe the ... will be ...and an alteration made when the ...w stamp Act is introduced.

The ...ient mode of transacting business at C...mbers has again been under consideration, and representations made in the proper quarters with a view of delegating the administration of oaths and matters of routine practice to the masters of the several common law courts, and particularly in term time, when the judges do not sit at chambers till three o'clock, and during the pressure preceding trials at the assizes, and on other occasions.

The council have also made several efforts to have the statutory qualification of the Chief Clerkship to the Masters in Chancery altered and placed upon a proper footing, namely, that none but solicitors of a certain standing should be eligible for the office; and as the propriety of altering the law seems to be generally admitted, the council trust that an opportunity will soon be afforded of accomplishing this object.

Many points have been submitted to the council relating to the Usages of the Profession, to which they have given their best attention. Amongst others they particularly notice, that it having been reported that practitioners in certain parts of the country stipulate in conditions of sale and in contracts that the vendor's solicitor shall prepare the conveyance to the purchaser, and, in some instances, that the purchaser shall pay to the vendor's solicitor a stipulated sum (exclusive of stamps) for the conveyance, the council came to the resolution "That such custom is contrary to the general usage and practice of the profession, and is objectionable in principle, and dangerous to the purchasers, by rendering them liable to be affected with constructive notice of incumbrances or defects of title, and to other disadvantges."

A copy of this resolution, signed by the president, was sent to every Law Society throughout the kingdom, and the council have reason to believe that it has had a good effect, and they recommend the members of this society to adhere strictly to the general usage, and so far as they can, prevent any deviation from it.

The old grievance of the Annual Certificate Duty has not been lost sight of. On the proposed renewal of the income tax, a petition from the society was again presented for the repeal or reduction of this impost; and the council intend to continue their endeavours to get rid of this unequal and unreasonable tax on the profession.

The exertions for the erection of more convenient Courts of Justice, and in a more central part of the metropolis, have been renewed this session. Petitions from the society collectively, and from a very large proportion of the London solicitors, and many others, have been presented to Parliament, and a motion in the House of Commons having been made by Mr. C. Buller, at the instance of the society, the Government acquiesced in the appointment of a committee of the House to consider of a proper site.

Numerous questions have arisen in the discharge of the duty intrusted to the society as Registrar of Attorneys and Solicitors, and the council have endeavoured in the performance of this duty to consult the advantage and convenience of the profession.

The new Rules and Orders of Court during the past year have been printed and sent to the members, and now, at the end of fourteen years since the opening of the institution, the council have deemed it useful to reprint the orders of all the courts, as well for the use of the new as the old members, and the volume will shortly be ready for delivery.

The Lectures have been continued by Mr. Cayley Shadwell on Conveyancing, by Mr. Stephens on Common Law and Criminal Law, and by Mr. Adams on Equity and Bankruptcy; and to these have been recently added a Course of Lectures on the Law of Nations, by Mr. Graves.

Several donations of books have been received, and a valuable fresco painting by Mr. Selous, of King Alfred delivering his Laws, has been presented by Mr. Lewis Pocock, and placed in the library.

The Examinations of Articled Clerks applying to be admitted on the Roll of Attorneys have been conducted as usual in the Hall of the Society, and the council hope much to the advantage of the Profession and the public.

In consequence of the prosperous state of the funds of the society, the annual subscription of the country members was some years ago reduced from 2*l*. to 1*l*. and in the present year the town subscription has been reduced from 3*l*. to 2*l*.

QUALIFICATION OF CHIEF CLERK TO THE MASTERS IN CHANCERY.

THE following petition has been presented to the Lord Chancellor, in the matter of Thomas Whiting, the chief clerk of Andrew Henry Lynch, Esq. one of the Masters of the Court of Chancery.

It is signed by thirty-two of the solicitors of the Court of Chancery, whose respective names and residences are thereunto subscribed.

It states that the petitioners are, and for many years have been, solicitors duly admitted to practise and ...ally practising in this honourable court, and in the course of their said practice the petitioners have the conduct and management of suits in progress through the offices of the Masters in ordinary, and divers of the petitioners have now the conduct and management of suits in which references have been directed to Mr. Lynch, one of the said Masters, and which references are still pending.

That the offices in the said masters' offices consist of the masters themselves and their chief clerks and copying or junior clerks, one chief clerk and one copying or junior clerk being attached to the separate office of each of the said masters.

That according to the usual course and practice of the said offices, it is the duty of the chief clerk to assist in the prosecution of all inquiries and accounts referred to the master to whose office he is attached, in which an exercise of the personal discretion of the master is not involved; and it is likewise, according to the same practice, the duty of the said chief clerk to prepare the drafts of the reports of such master, and to settle such reports in the presence of the solicitors concerned.

That a very large amount of the business of this honourable court is, in fact, transacted by attendance before the chief clerks of the said masters, and that, in the prosecution of suits in the said masters' offices, the solicitors of this honourable court have to attend before the chief clerk more frequently than before the master, and that it is of the highest importance to the interests of the suitors of the court, as well as due to the solicitors of the court, individually and as a body, that an officer before whom such solicitors have to lay statements, and to whose judgment they are called upon to defer, should not be selected from a lower rank in society than themselves, and should be qualified by his station to attain their respect and confidence.

That, from the earliest time, the said office of chief clerk to any of the said masters in ordinary has been executed by the holder thereof, for the time being, in person and not by deputy.

That the copying or junior clerk in the office of each of the said masters is usually a person who was clerk to the Master while at the bar, and that the duty of such copying or junior clerk is to wait personally upon the Master, and to receive the fees in the office, and to make the appointments for attendance before the Master and the chief clerk respectively, and to enter and copy accounts, reports, and proceedings.

That by an Act of Parliament, passed in the session of the third and fourth years of the reign of his late Majesty King William the Fourth, intituled "An Act for the Regulation of the Proceedings and Practice of certain Offices of the High Court of Chancery in England," it was among other things enacted, that no person should be appointed to be chief clerk of any Master in Ordinary of this honourable Court, unless he should have been admitted on the roll of solicitors or attorneys in one of the Courts of Westminster Hall, for not less than five years, or should have been a junior clerk in the office of one of the said Masters for a term of ten years. And it was thereby, among other things, further enacted, that each and every of the Masters in Ordinary, registrars, and clerks of the said registrars, master of reports and entries, clerk of affidavits, and examiners of this honourable Court, should hold their said offices during their good behaviour, and so long as they should personally give their attendance upon their respective duties, and should conduct themselves honestly and faithfully in the due execution of the duties of their said offices respectively; and that the officers and clerks in the several offices of this honourable Court should give their personal attendance in their respective offices during the times they should be so directed to attend, as by the said Act provided, unless otherwise engaged in the business of their respective offices, or prevented by sickness or other unavoidable causes. And it was further enacted, that there should be paid by the accountant-general of this honourable court, out of the fund to be placed to his account, to be entitled "The Suitors' Fee Fund Account," to the several officers named in the schedule thereunder written the several salaries or yearly sums set opposite to their respective names or titles in such schedule, being (among other things) the salary or yearly sum of one thousand pounds to the chief clerk of each of the said masters in ordinary other than the accountant-general, and the salary or yearly sum of one hundred and fifty pounds to the junior clerk of each of the said masters; and it was further thereby enacted, that it should be lawful for the copying or writing clerk of the said masters to receive and take the sum of one penny halfpenny per folio of 90 words, and no more, for every copy of every document or writing or a part of any document or writing made in the masters' offices, from the parties requiring the same, and also for the transcript of every report, and that such sum of one penny halfpenny per folio should be retained by the said writing or copying clerks to be employed by the said Masters in their respective offices, and that no part thereof should be received or retained by, or applied to the use or benefit of, any other person or persons on any pretence whatsoever.

That in the month of December 1843, Andrew Henry Lynch, esq. one of the said Masters in Ordinary appointed Thomas Whiting, who had then been copying or junior clerk in the office of another of the said Masters for more than ten years, to be the chief clerk of him the said Master Lynch, and in the month of June 1844, the Lord Chancellor was pleased to order that the salary of one thousand pounds, provided for persons filling the said office of chief clerk, should be paid to the said Thomas Whiting, since which time the said Thomas Whiting has annually received such salary.

That, notwithstanding such appointment of the said Thomas Whiting, and such receipt by him of the said salary, he has never performed, or in any manner attempted to perform, and does not now perform, the important duties belonging to the said office of chief clerk to the said Master Lynch, but that such duties have been ever since his said appointment performed by, and the same are now continuing to be performed by, Edward Wright, the junior or copying clerk in the said office of the said Master Lynch, who is not himself qualified according to law for the office of such chief clerk, and by such means the duties of chief clerk to the said Master Lynch are in fact performed by a deputy and an unqualified person. And the said Thomas Whiting has, ever since his said appointment, performed the duties of copying or junior clerk, and no other duties, in the said office of the said Master Lynch; and the petitioners believe that that the said Thomas Whiting is, in fact, incompetent to discharge the duties of chief clerk to the said Master.

That the petitioners are advised, and humbly submit to the Lord Chancellor, that an office of so much trust and importance as that of chief clerk to one of the said masters, ought not to be executed by deputy, and that to permit the same to be so executed would be establishing a principle injurious to the interest of the suitors of this court, and contrary to the true intent and meaning of the said Act of Parliament, and would have the effect of depriving the said suitors of the security intended to be given to them by the said Act for the performance of the duties of the said office by persons possessing the experience and legal attainment indispensable for the efficient discharge thereof; and the petitioners, in their character of solicitors of this honourable court, and also as representing the interests of the suitors of this honourable court confided to their care, feel aggrieved by the premises.

The petitioners therefore pray his lordship to cause inquiry to be made into the matters aforesaid, and into the manner in which the duties of the office of chief clerk to the said Master Lynch are now, and have been since the appointment of the said Thomas Whiting thereto, executed and performed. And that his lordship will be pleased to order that henceforth the duties of the said office may be performed by the said Thomas Whiting, while he shall continue such chief clerk, in person, and not by the copying or junior clerk of the said Master, or by any other deputy; and that in case the said Thomas Whiting shall neglect personally to perform such duties, or shall be found incompetent thereto, that he, the said Thomas Whiting, may be removed from being such chief clerk of the said Master Lynch, and that in such case his lordship will be pleased to make order for the due appointment of some other properly qualified person to the said office of chief clerk, in the place and stead of the said Thomas Whiting.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE LOST WILLS FROM DOCTORS' COMMONS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

SIR,—Several professional gentlemen have informed me that your journal is the emporium of every passing event affecting the best interests of the profession and their clients, and have shewn me a letter last week, whereby you have drawn attention to this national loss, laid open by me, through Parliament. From my knowledge of the facts after thirty years' service in the Prerogative Will office, Doctors'-commons, I will at once answer your last week's query, and give further information to the profession and the public, through your pages, by now stating that an Act of Parliament must be obtained to make the registered copies of the lost wills evidence in a court of law from the fact of the wills having been proved. It would appear by the discussions upon this very important subject in the metropolitan, daily, weekly, and also provincial press, that great and increased interest and anxiety is felt regarding this public loss, which has, at last, driven the authorities at Doctors'-commons (in order, if possible, to allay the strong fears universally entertained) to state that they made an entry of these lost wills in some "private" memorandum-book, but they decline to shew the entries so made containing the names of the many testators, with the real and personal estates conveyed!! These are not made public! nor is there any notice given regarding them! The result is, that searches are frequently made for a will supposed to be among the lost ones, and, upon finding such name in the calendar or index, reference is immediately made to the registry copy, and no information given, whether the original will, of which such copy is made, is one of the lost wills or not; so that a party who wishes to find the name of any one of such lost wills, cannot obtain it without the knowledge of the name of such individual will, and which is alone contained in the withheld index or "memorandum-book," in the possession of the heads at Doctors'-commons. I myself, as the agent of 294 applicants (stated by me before through the public press), having applied, not only to the deputy-registrar, but also to four clerks in the Prerogative Registry, for a list of the names of such lost wills, in order to enable Mr. Duncombe, who presented my petition to the House of Commons, to put the House in full possession of the case for the benefit of the profession at large; I also applied to the Judge-Advocate-General, but they all declined; the ground assigned by the Judge-Advocate-General being "that such information ought not to be given, fearing that it might make the public uneasy. This letter so sent to me, by one of her Majesty's Government, I will with pleasure send you a copy of, if you require it, along with the correspondence on the subject between me and the Lord Chancellor, and the heads of the Prorogative-office, pending the presental of my petition also to the House of Lords by his lordship; a subject altogether, I can without contradiction assert, to be of the first as well as the last importance to the profession, as well as to every proctor or other official connected with the 300 provincial civil courts trying to be "metropolitanized," under the forthcoming precious "Ecclesiastical Courts Bill," so prejudicial to a host of country solicitors throughout England and Wales, whose powerful influence has, at present, effectually overturned the measure, although three times within reach of the goal, and who will now be additionally on the alert from this letter, knowing your unflinching advocacy to every thing like professional abuse, or the just rights of the public through the profession. I rejoice, with hundreds of others, that you have opened your columns to this important subject; as you will hear again from me shortly, and trusting that in the meantime, the 12,000 attorneys will be actively exerting themselves to press, both in and out of Parliament, a thorough disclosure of the extent or amount of this national loss out of Doctors'-commons.

Let me advise every attorney whose client may be suffering by a loss of one of these wills, to cause a public discussion through the court by a mandamus, where the estate of the testator will bear it—this will FORCE the disclosure.

I remain, &c.

OMISSIONS IN SMALL DEBTS ACT.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

SIR,—I have looked carefully through this Act, and am unable to discover what fees are to be taken for filing application for summons,—order, examination, warrant, &c. in cases before inferior courts of record, under section 1; or for examination, order, &c. under section 4. I shall be glad of the opinion of some of your able correspondents on this head.

My difficulties do not end here. In fact the fees given, which may be taken as a sample of those intended, are so trivial, as not to be of much moment, being nothing like a sufficient remuneration in those courts where but few cases are likely to occur. It is to these courts that every facility therefore ought to be provided by the legislature, when their officers are called upon to carry the laws into execution. Hence it is that I complain of the want of proper forms of order and commitment. The immaterial and simple forms of application and summons are given in schedules A and B; but as if it was intended to mock the courts which are expected to carry out this piece of extraordinary legislation, the material forms which I speak of are wholly omitted. Thus the functionaries of such courts are left to frame some order and warrant of commitment of their own, which, most probably, will be visited with a writ of habeas, and the Lord Chancellor's compliments, under sec. 10; for all "unfortunate debtors" can find the funds for such a process; or if not, there are others quite ready to do it for them, where there is good game to fire at—or in return for some sixpence or a shilling (supposing the fees in Schedule D to be receivable in all courts) to pay two guineas to counsel to settle the forms of order and warrant or commitment. To any one who knows the difficulty there is in making a good conviction where no form is given, and how much greater difficulty there is in framing an order which cannot be amended, it seems almost incredible that a public Act (which may be said to belong to the Solicitor-General) should be passed without these indispensable requisites. Unless such forms are given in the "LAW TIMES Edition" of this statute, you will be conferring one more to the many valuable boons which you have already given to the Profession, to have the forms in question forthwith settled by counsel and printed for sale.

Yours respectfully,

AN ATTORNEY of 16 years' standing, and Judge of an Inferior Court of Record.

Aug. 19, 1845.

[There can be no doubt that the Act was framed with the usual precipitancy and negligence which characterize of late years our legislation. The omission of which our correspondent complains is an obvious one. Difficulties will undoubtedly attend the settling of forms of order and commitment, but it is a matter for consideration whether we shall undertake the publication of forms settled by counsel as our correspondent proposes.—ED. L. T.]

ATTORNEYS' GOWNS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

SIR,—There was discussed in many of your valuable numbers of the LAW TIMES, of last year, the propriety of the legal profession resuming the gown, when professionally engaged at the Assizes, &c. Your correspondent wishes to know what has been done in this matter?—why nothing more is said on the subject?

I am, Sir, yours, &c.
AN OLD SUBSCRIBER.

Cambridge, Aug. 20, 1845.

[Some gentlemen at the time informed us that they had appeared in court in gowns, but whether the practice is continued or grows in favour, owing to want of information on the subject, we are unable to say.—ED. LAW T.]

SMALL DEBTS ACT.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

SIR,—I think the question whether other parties than attorneys-at-law can be employed to conduct proceedings under this statute, where a party does not conduct his own, needs not harrass the Profession.

The word "attorney," it is well known, received its legitimate construction by the Commissioners of Bankrupts, and unless there be something in this Act repugnant to that construction, it must of course continue to receive its technical meaning of attorney-at-law.

In the first section, we have the words "attorney who shall have practised as an attorney for not less than ten years in one of her Majesty's superior courts," &c. In sec. 3, the words "signed by the plaintiff, or his attorney," occur. In sec. 4, the words "attorney of ten years' standing" again occur. In sec. 6 it is enacted, that it shall "not be necessary for any party, whether creditor or debtor, to employ either counsel or attorney, or solicitor." In the interpretation clause of the word "judge," we find in combination "barrister-at-law, special pleader, and attorney of ten years' standing."

Thus the word attorney is in all these cases used in the same sense, and that its technical sense.

The tables of fees, however, contain no allowance whatever for any attorney; therefore it is evident that none is contemplated to be necessary, and if an attorney be engaged, he must of course be paid by his own client.

The rich man will do this in every case.

That the statute, therefore, virtually enacts that a party may conduct his own cause, which is his ancient undoubted common law birthright, proves nothing but the ignorance of the draughtsman, and is no argument in the absence of express words enabling him to do so, that he may employ other persons than those ancient officers specially set apart by the law for this purpose.

By the first section it is enacted, that the "debtor shall be interrogated by the creditor summoning him, &c., and "the creditor shall be interrogated by the said debtor," &c., not by or on the behalf.

The duty, then, of these parties will be either to conduct their own causes or to employ those who have a legal right to appear as "counsel, or attorney, or solicitor" in courts of law, and those alone, for there is not within the four corners of this Act any one word that authorizes any previously unauthorized person to step forward and claim a right of audience. Indeed, the terms of the third section, as to the signing of a prisoner's liberator, clearly prove that, where signed by other than the plaintiff, it must be "his attorney;" and no one can be his attorney unless he be an attorney-at-law, the word being used in every place in the same sense. And the course for any attorney to adopt who should come in contact with a judge who would hear a person on the behalf of a party not an attorney-at-law, as I think, would be to advise his client to refuse answering any questions put directly by such a person, and not by the party himself or the Court, and leave the Court to exercise its power of imprisoning for contempt if it thought proper to do so, or else proceed against such under the Attorney and Solicitors Act.

ATTORNEYS' CERTIFICATE DUTY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

SIR,—In reply to the inquiry of Mr. J. T. Shapland, of South Molton, made through the medium of the LAW TIMES of last week, I beg to state that Sir Thomas Wilde presented the petitions from the attorneys and solicitors of England and Wales and of Ireland, for the repeal of the annual duty on their certificates, and that they were ordered to lie on the table.

I am, Sir, yours, &c.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

SIR,—I beg to call your attention to a very odd coincidence. The Editor of the Times thinks it "unseemly and undignified" in a barrister to canvass for the office of judge; but not one word does he say about the fit predicates for such conduct in an attorney. The Editor of the Times has a great deal to say about the office of judge to the Westminster Court of Requests, not one word about the office of judge to any other Metropolitan Court. Now there is an attorney putting up for the office of judge to the Westminster Court of Requests; that attorney is most intimately connected with very influential persons in the public press, and with the Editor of a journal which the Times praises, because it fears it Punch namely. What is the inference?

THE LAW TIMES.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 23, 1845.

THE JUDGESHIP OF THE COURTS OF REQUESTS.

THE hatred with which the Times regards the members of the Bar, owing to their independence in the dispute with the Press, and their obstinacy in persisting in the c think safest and most honourable to pursue, has found vent in an attack on certain barristers who are candidates far the new Judgeships established under the Small Debts Bill. Some of these, it seems, have been guilty of the heinous crime of issuing circulars to the Commissioners in whose hands the Legislature has vested the power of appointment to the newly created offices; to others is imputed a yet more glaring offence, the article going so far as to assert that there was evidence before the writer that "these members of an exclusive profession are capable of resorting to all the expedients employed at Cirencester, Southwark, or Sunderland." The meaning of this is intelligible enough. It was not our intention to have moved in this affair, nor should we refer to it now, had not allusion been made o us personally in an article on the subject in the Times of Thursday, and did not justice to a gentleman of high character (to whom we gave a simple testimonial that he was competent to discharge the duties of the office he sought) require it. Whether a Barrister or an Attorney be appointed is equally a matter of indifference to us; we have expressed no opinion as to which of the two is best adapted for the office, nor is it necessary we should do so. The Legislature has vested in certain Commissioners the power of appointing whom they choose, and the integrity of their choice shall receive neither bias nor prejudice from us.

In giving a simple certificate of competency to a gentleman whom we had long known, and who had justified our expressions by a sound and useful treatise on the jurisdiction of the Courts of Requests, a man, moreover, of ten years' standing at the Bar, and of unexceptionable private character, we did simply that which it were not merely ungracious, but unjust, to refuse to any one who might, to our knowledge, be entitled to such a courtesy. And here let us remark, that where an act of brotherly charity, such as this, can be made the subject of a sneer, we may be as sure there is a deficiency of solid grounds for censure as there is malice in the heart and venom in the pen of him who writes it.

The gravamen of the charge against this gentleman is, that he has sent circulars to the Commissioners, with the view of securing their votes. Now, whether or not it is degrading to a barrister to solicit the suffrages of those in whose disposal an office has by law been placed, we need not at present discuss; not that precedent is wanting, for it is the custom to canvass for the offices of Recorder and Common Serjeant. We have every reason to believe, though we cannot at this moment substantiate our belief by distinct reference, that Messrs. M. D. HILL and MIREHOUSE canvassed personally for the office of Common Serjeant. Either way, it is most degrading to the press—for in this its champion we take a part for the whole, on the same principle as he identifies the Bar with a single member of it—we repeat, it is most degrading to the Press when it descends to misquote (as we shall shew it has done), for the purpose, we fear, of insinuating ignorance, vulgarity of style, and deficient education, against a man to whom none of these peculiarities apply—and that simply because the Bar is at present obnoxious to the Press—other reason for it we can find

The Times imputes to a barrister, a gentleman, and a Cambridge-man to boot, the following language, marking in italics the words so given below:—"For the last five years I have reported all the decisions on orders, convictions, prohibitions, certioraris, and habeas corpuses;" whereas the words he used (we extract them from his circular, which lies before us) were these—"For the last five years I have reported for a legal work all the cases decided in the Court of Queen's Bench, on the subject of orders, convictions, writs of prohibition, certiorari, and habeas corpus."

Now, it is difficult to suppose that the Times fell inadvertently into this misquotation, for one would suppose that the simple penning of such stuff would have awakened the attention of the writer, and induced him to refer to the circular for authority. The presumption, therefore, is, that the misquotation was intentional.

We regret to find the Press descending to such meannesses as these. Had the quarrel with the Bar never arisen, we should not, in all probability, have heard a syllable of censure on the subject of Barristers canvassing for this office of Judge; nor, indeed, has the writer of the article in the Times the audacity to claim for himself purity of motive; his only intention is clear enough—to vilify and cast odium on the Bar. Happily, however, with all whose opinion is to be coveted, such an attempt defeats the purpose of its maker, and recoils with a blow to his own head.

VERULAM SOCIETY.

It is with pleasure we announce to the members of the Verulam Society, and indeed to the subscribers to the LAW TIMES generally, that an arrangement has been concluded with Messrs. KNIGHT and Co. by which the extensive series of Magistrates', Poor Law, and Parochial Forms, already published, or in rapid progress by them, will be immediately added to the Society's list, and supplied to the members at the Society's prices. The series will ultimately embrace upwards of 1,500 of these practical forms, of which some three or four hundred are now ready, and may be had by order transmitted to the LAW TIMES Office. Prospectuses, with lists of these forms, are in preparation, and now may be had all those relating to Poor Law, Settlement Law, and Parochial Law.

The above, added to the extensive series of Common Law and Conveyancing Forms, issued by the society, will make the largest and most perfect set of forms for office use which has been ever offered to the Legal Profession.

LAW TIMES EDITION OF IMPORTANT STATUTES.

THE LAW TIMES Edition of the Real Property Statutes, edited by G. S. ALLNUTT, Esq. Barrister-at-Law, with copious Notes, Forms, and a complete Index, is now at press, and may be had in the early part of the week.

THE SMALL DEBTS ACT.—HASTY LEGISLATION.

THE twenty-pound debt Confiscation Act therefore passed both Houses with the smallest possible discussion that could be decently bestowed on a public measure. It was to come into operation immediately; and before the judges and commissioners, who were to give effect to its enactments, could get a copy of it from the Queen's printer, they were called upon to carry it into execution. This occurring in the midst of the Long Vacation, when judges, and even commissioners, are supposed to be entitled to some relaxation, was in itself a considerable inconvenience. The Act, too, provided that the Court of Bankruptcy should frame rules and orders for the better carrying it into execution, and also to frame a table of fees. This would necessarily require time, and, in point of fact, many months elapsed before these, which should have been preliminary measures, were effected. To augment, or with the effect of augmenting, the confusion, which the mere desire of liberation would necessarily occasion, by the number of simultaneous applications at the most inconvenient season, Lord Brougham deemed it expedient to issue a sort of proclamation from Brougham Hall, directing the mode of proceeding, and, among other things, asserting that the words "attorney in the matter of this petition" in the form of attestation, did not mean an attorney-at-law. The commissioners of the Court of Bankruptcy came to a contrary conclusion; and a feud immediately arose between these judicial functionaries and their ex-officio patron, who did not hesitate to denounce them as neglecting their duty, and giving the most perverse interpretations to the Act of Parliament. The accusation, however, did not produce much impression on the public mind; a solitary petitition of a solitary attorney was presented by the noble lord, served for the foundation of a speech, and was then withdrawn!

We should not have adverted to these matters, but that they are necessary to the proper understanding of certain clauses in the Bill now before us, which would be utterly inexplicable without this clue.

We will proceed at once to the examination of these points. Lord Brougham was at issue with the commissioners on three principal heads:—

1st. That the petition and schedule of an insolvent need not be attested by an attorney-at-law. It was contended, on the one hand, that anybody appointed to do an act for another was his attorney or agent; on the other side it was urged that the uniform interpretation of the term, when used in reference to legal proceedings, had been in a more restricted sense; that the practice of the Insolvent Debtors' Court, pari materia, was to require the attestation of one of its own attorneys, and that such practice secured the regularity of proceedings, and though, in the first instance, involving a trifling expense, generally induced an ultimate saving by avoiding the risks of dismissals or adjournment fo informalities. Sec. 6 of the present Act not only enacts but declares that, in making any application, or taking any proceedings, &c., it shall not be requisite to employ counsel, attorney, or solicitor. Now, on the general proposition that a party might conduct his case in person, there never had been any question; the whole of this clause, therefore, is to operate as a Parliamentary judgment against the commissioners; but as the noble appellant has never set forth his case or his arguments, and the judges have been equally silent, though the law is declared, the reason is unsatisfied. It was supposed by some that this clause was to have a greater range, and that it would enable any person to act as an attorney or agent in the matter of a petition, though not an attorney of the court. This was obviously an error, as we have demonstrated on a former occasion, and we are happy to observe that though they fight against odds—Jupiter hostis—the commissioners show no disposition to let down the character of their proceedings by letting in unprofessional agents.

The second head of dispute was the discharge of prisoners without notice to the detaining creditor. At first the commissioners thought themselves bound to pursue this course; but, after a few instances of the absconding of petitioners, as soon as they had obtained their liberation and protection, the subject was re-considered, and the practice established which called forth the seventh clause of the Bill, as it went down from the Lords. Instant discharge was to be the rule—no postponement "for two days, or for any other period of time, upon the ground of enabling the detaining creditor to shew cause against granting such order, or upon any other ground whatever." The petitioner might be notoriously a trader owing thousands! he might avow that he had sent all his property to Philadelphia, and was about to follow it by the next morning's steam-packet! The commissioner must give the discharge, and grant the protection! In a less serious case, if a petitioning prisoner were inclined to amuse himself by playing with the Court and his creditors, he would ask, and, under some pretence very probably obtain, a long day—the day arrived—the Court sitting—the creditors assembled—Jeremy Diddler called—no appearance! The petition is dismissed; but on the following day another may be filed, and so on toties quoties. In bankruptcy there is a remedy for this; the non-surrendering bankrupt commits a felony, not so the non-surrendering insolvent—he is under no liability, under no restriction. The twin Bill of 5 & 6 Vict. (afterwards 7 & 8 Vict.) afforded a remedy for this inconvenience, as it enacted that the commissioner "may grant to such petitioning debtor a temporary and limited protection from arrest," "for such time and within such limits and conditions as shall be specified," or to require bail; and such petitioner, though so protected, may be arrested at the suit of any creditor whose debt is not truly specified in the schedule, or whose debt has been contracted in fraud, or if the debtor is about to abscond beyond the jurisdiction, or has concealed, or is concealing, any part of his estate. With such precautions there might be less evil in the indiscriminate discharge of prisoners; without them the evil is obvious. In fact, the clause had no argument in the Lords, and could bear none in the Commons; it disappeared.

The third of the perverse interpretations was, that where a trader had previously taken the benefit of the Insolvent Act, the amount of his then debts must be added to his present liabilities, so that if the whole exceeded 300*l.* he would be disqualified from the new mode of relief, and be compelled to resort either to the Court which had previous cognizance of his case, or become bankrupt, which he might now be on his own petition. The latter part of the 5th clause, as it went from the Lords, was framed with a view to the reversal of this judgment; but it shared the fate of clause 7, and we suppose for the same reason.

As these were all the perverse interpretations to which a practical remedy was proposed, and as two out of the three remedies have been rejected, and as none of the perverse interpretations have been argued, none of the six perverse judges exposed to the odium to which a conspiracy to pervert the law ought to have subjected them, we may congratulate these functionaries on their acquittal of the very serious charges brought against them by their noble accuser. We once knew a father (a reasonable man in other respects) who could not bear the slightest contradiction, or difference of opinion from his own children, though they were grown men, and by the rest of the world looked upon as of competent ability. By the parent they were always viewed as in a state of pupilage, and every indication of independence was resented as an overt act of rebellion. And thus our great reformer regards his commissioners—his, quos genuit quos eduxit, and seems to have resented the disregard of his proclamation as a flagrant mark of filial ingratitude.

We will now pass to the general progress of the bill. A very few words will suffice for its passage through the Lords—there was no debate—even Lord Campbell did not make a speech; and Lord Cottenham probably thought it best to allow his adversaries to work out their own blunders, occasioned, as they were, by the unceremonious defeat of his own large and well-considered measure. But though they passed in silence, the mutations of the measure were curious, and any one who will take the trouble of comparing the bill, as first read, with that which passed the third reading, and was sent down to the Commons, will find that the imperfection of execution was only equalled by the infirmity of purpose.

The course in the Commons was a little less silent, and yet more curious.

On Wednesday, the 23rd, the Bill was, in committee under the conduct of the Attorney-General.

On the following day it was reported, and ordered to be printed; that print is now before us, headed, "As amended by the Committee on re-commitment and on Report." At the conclusion of the first clause is the proviso, which the Lord Chancellor was so anxious to repudiate, and in respect of which he imputes some unfairness ... ...e person or persons unknown, for having introduced it in the absence of the Solicitor-General. Was the Attorney-General present? Was the Home Secretary present? Was the draftsman of the Home-office under the gallery? What was he doing there? This, according to the Chancellor, was not a Government measure, yet members of the Government appear to have taken an extraordinary interest in it. Do we blame them? Far from it. Few subjects could be more worthy their attention. Our complaint is, that their interest was not more early, more continuous, and more effective.

The Bill as reported contained twenty-four clauses, the Act as passed contains twenty-five. One clause, therefore, the eighth, must have been added at the third reading; this we believe is not an unusual, though certainly an inconvenient practice. But how, of the remaining twenty-four clauses, no less than eighteen should have been altered, without any re-commitment of the Bill, somewhat puzzles our notions of Parliamentary proceedings; and more especially as Sir James Graham, on the 28th of July, seems to have urged the same difficulty in answer to some suggestions of Captain Berkeley. The Chancellor, in moving that the Lords should agree to the amendments of the Commons, adverts to some verbal alterations; by this might be understood the correction of clerical errors; but we doubt whether, under such general words, alterations, materially affecting the measure, would have been made, due regard being had to the usage of Parliament. The second clause, for instance, contains one of the most extraordinary innovations on the law and practice of bankruptcy, the history of which would assuredly be quite as curious as that of the repudiated proviso. As it originally stood it would have made the order of a judge of a court of conscience superior to the Lord Chancellor's certificate under the Great Seal—did the Solicitor-General see this clause? It is now partially amended as affects certificates obtained before making of the order for imprisonment, but how or when this amendment was made we have been unable to ascertain.

In clause 2, the words "or the instalments thereof payable" inserted, and the word "the" changed into the word "a," materially alter the sense.

In clause 9, "Her Majesty, with the advice of her Privy Council," is substituted for the Secretary of State, &c.

In clause 10. the judges of the courts of requests or conscience are made removable by the Lord Chancellor; in the Bill as reported in the Commons, they were subjected to the more formal judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council on the petition of the Attorney-General, directed by the Secretary of State.

In clause 13, the substitution of the words "last-mentioned" for the word "said" removes an ambiguity.

In clause 14, the Treasury is substituted for the Secretary of State; in compensation for which, in clause 17, the secretary is substituted for the Treasury; and a material proviso, for increased salary for increased business, is omitted.

In short, sections 1, 2, 3, 4, 7, 9, 10, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 20, 23, and 24 have been more or less altered since the report in the Commons; that is, since the last opportunity the public had of being informed of the impending legislation. Section 8 has been added, and sections 5, 6, 11, 19, 21, and 25, most of which are merely formal, are left unaltered.

Again, we ask, is this a mode of legislation calculated to command the respect and confidence of the country? Is it parliamentary? Is it conservative? Is it constitutional? If induced by an urgent necessity, we might have understood it, if there were pressure for time against an immediately-impending calamity, we might have excused it. There appears to be no such apology. The Lord Chancellor still defends the clause in the former statute, which was the root of the evil; he actually presents a petition from 1,800 merchants, bankers, and traders against the Bill, and then admits the pressure from without of a committee of Delegates as a reason for passing it. He admits that the regular course would have been to put the establishment of new tribunals into a separate Bill—why was it not done? it was late in the session, and yet a whole week was lost between the third reading in the Commons on Tuesday, the 29th of July, and the consideration of the amendments in the Lords on Tuesday, the 6th of August. We do not pretend to know (though we may venture to guess,) how this interval was actually employed—we complain that it was not employed more profitably. The Chancellor says that the twenty new clauses were all consequent on one (the 9th); our analysis is different. We find four clauses as they passed from the Lords; nine clauses which relate to the establishment of the new tribunals; ten clauses which would have been equally necessary to the old or new courts; one clause quite new, and one clause merely formal.

Not a single peer justified the passing of the Bill; but all agreed "under circumstances" (a most convenient salvo) that it should pass. And here we leave it for the present. Our observations have hitherto been principally directed to the mode and not to the matter; our text was "how are laws made?" But we shall very shortly revert to the subject of the particular statute which has induced this inquiry for the purpose of discussing its merits or demerits as it is made."

LECTURES ON MEDICAL JURISPRUDENCE.

By Alfred S. Taylor.

Delivered at Guy's Hospital, 1844.

Lecture XIII.

Poisoning by lead and its salts—Symptoms—Post mortem appearances—Treatment—Colica pictonum—Chemical analysis—Detection of lead in organic substances.

We have now to say a few words on poisoning by lead. The salts of this metal are classed among the irritant poisons; but they differ from the other irritant poisons in producing the most intense pain, similar to colic. It has been said that the salts of lead are not poisonous. Those which have been generally found to be poisonous are the acetate, the sub-acetate, the chloride, the carbonate, and the oxide; but Dr. Thompson says that the carbonate is the only poisonous salt of this metal. It does not appear that this assertion is well founded on experiment or observation; because in giving the chloride, which is not easily converted into the carbonate, serious effects have been produced on animals. It is sufficient to say that the acetate of lead is not a very active poison, yet when taken in doses of half an ounce to one ounce it is capable of producing very violent effects. A case is recorded in which 30 grains of acetate of lead were given daily for 30 days, and then slight symptoms of colic were produced. It is undoubtedly capable of acting as a poison when taken in sufficient quantity. When the quantity taken has been from one to two ounces, then the following symptoms have been produced: a burning pricking pain in the throat, with dryness and thirst; vomiting supervenes; there is uneasiness in the epigastrium, which is sometimes followed by violent colic, like common colic, felt about the navel; the abdomen is tense, and the parietes have been occasionally drawn in. The pain is relieved by pressure, and differs from most cases of irritant poisoning by the pain having intermissions. The bowels are obstinately constipated, and this is also another variation from the general effects of irritant poisons. The skin is cold, and there is great prostration of strength, and the patient sometimes expires suddenly. Death is preceded by giddiness, torpor, and coma, cramps in the calves of the legs, pain in the thighs, and paralysis of the extremities. The post mortem appearances, of which we have very little means of judging with regard to man, have been observed in animals to be, inflammation of the mucous coat of the stomach and the intestines, which have been found contracted. In many cases of poisoning by this substance, the facts have been proved, and the coroner has not allowed the medical witnesses to examine the body.

The treatment consists in the free exhibition of the alkaline sulphates, either of soda or magnesia; but not the carbonates, otherwise a carbonate of lead will be formed, which is poisonous. Supposing no vomiting to take place, then emetics must be administered, and the stomach-pump may be used. Albumen has been used as an antidote. It precipitates the oxide of lead. Milk may be given, the albuminous principle of which, casein, precipitates the oxide of lead.

Sub-acetate of lead, or Goulard's extract, produces effects very like those of the acetate.

Carbonate of lead is a very active poison, and gives rise to colica pictonum. It diffuses in a fine powder, and enters the body through the lungs. The manufacture of white lead has been, until lately, the source of much mischief, from the respiration of the powder through the lungs; but recently this great evil has been partially remedied by the practice of grinding the white lead with water. Among the diagnostic symptoms of colica pictonum are blueness about the gums and the borders of the teeth. Lead has not been found in this part of the body, so far as I am aware; and sometimes, it ought to be stated, a similar appearance has been found in cases where no lead has been supposed to exist. Colica pictonum often kills the patient, and after death the intestines are found contracted, especially the colon. No traces of lead have ever been discovered in any of the secretions, excretions, or soft organs of the body. Carbonate of lead gives rise to many serious accidents. Water becomes poisoned by it, and produces symptoms that would often embarrass medical men, unless they were aware of the cause of the change. Lead is used for transferring water through pipes or cisterns; and in these cases carbonate of lead is formed in large quantities and diffused through the water. We now know pretty clearly the condition on which this depends, and it is worth while to explain the fact. If you take new lead and introduce it into distilled water, in a few minutes (on a bright summer's day, in the light of the sun) you may see a film of the carbonate formed in the water around it, and the purer the water the more rapidly the change takes place. The water that produces it in the greatest abundance is pure distilled water. This change does not occur with old lead, which is covered with a crust of the oxide to which the carbonate adheres; it is thus protected from the action of the water. Other kinds of water, besides distilled water, will produce this change, particularly water obtained from chalky soils, which is strongly impregnated with carbonic acid. Persons may go on drinking water impregnated with carbonate of lead for weeks and months without experiencing any ill effects; but after a time, pains in the bowels, pricking sensations in the limbs, and paralysis of the extremities occur, which would appear altogether inexplicable unless medical men had their attention directed to these points. The water of the Thames is an excellent water for resisting the action of lead. What is the difference between this water and distilled water? One has been distilled, and the other has not. The Thames water contains the 7,000th part of its weight of saline matter, while in the other there is no saline matter. It is the presence of the saline matter that prevents the action of water on lead. I have kept in some Thames water, for five years, a mass of lead, so that air could freely get to it, yet no carbonate has been produced. This is an interesting fact, because it leads to the question, what is the sort of water that prevents the change in the lead of which I have been speaking? Many experiments have been performed with the view of ascertaining this point, and we are deeply indebted to Dr. Christison for his able services in this matter. From the experiments I have made, it would appear that sulphate of lime is the salt which, by its presence in most kinds of hard water, prevents this action on lead. If you put a piece of new lead into equal parts of distilled water, and a solution of sulphate of lime, there will be no action on the lead. Sulphate of lime is therefore the best test for carbonate of lead, because it is quite tasteless and produces no unpleasant effects. Rain water distilled is very bad, and possesses some of the same properties as water impregnated with carbonate of lead. When the sulphate of lime forms only the 5,000th part of the weight of water, no carbonate of lead is formed, and the sulphate of lime dissolved in this proportion in distilled water, will render it very much like river water. Sulphate of lead is slowly formed: it closely fixes itself to the lead, and prevents the production of any carbonate of lead. Water which is abundantly precipitated by a salt of barytes, and by oxalate of ammonia, is not very likely to give rise to lead colic by passing through lead pipes, or being preserved in leaden cisterns. The way in which the sulphate acts appears to be this; oxygen is absorbed by the water, and oxide of lead and subsequently sulphate of lead, are found. There are some other cases in which lead has given rise to accidents. Shot are used for cleaning wine-bottles, and are liable to be left in them; accidents have been said to arise from this cause; but it does not seem likely that with good wine any accident can occur. Home-made wines, containing acetic acid, are liable to this danger when shot are left in the bottles. I have found that, when the shot were in much larger proportion than could ever be left by accident in a wine-bottle, good wine, whether port or sherry, became slowly impregnated with lead. After two or three months, a white sediment had formed but no lead was dissolved. After thirteen months, the port wine retained its colour, and scarcely any portion of lead was dissolved in it; the sherry had become darker in colour, and the presence of lead was very evident in it. I commenced this experiment in 1839: the port wine still has a dull red colour, and gives only faint traces of lead; while the sherry has acquired a pale straw-colour, and is pretty strongly impregnated with lead. In the course of a short time the tartaric acid in home-made wines will form tartrate of lead, which destroys the colour of the wine; but hydro-sulphuret of ammonia will detect the presence of the lead.

Litharge, which is much used in the arts, has sometimes given rise to accidental poisoning. Liquids used for culinary purposes are liable to become impregnated with oxide of lead, derived from the glaze of the vessel in which they are kept, and to form poisonous salts. If vinegar be used, acetate of lead may be the result, by dissolving the glaze. Litharge glaze is also dissolved by alkaline or fatty substances. When joints of meat are baked in newly-glazed dishes, the dripping is impregnated with oxide of lead, and is liable to produce symptoms of colic.

The salts of lead are characterized by presenting no differences of colour- they are all white they have a sweet astringent taste. There are four soluble salts—the acetate, the sub-acetate, the nitrate, and the chloride; and two insoluble—the sulphate and the carbonate. Sugar of lead is by far the most common form of poison. It is presented in the form of a white powder, or else in crystalline masses, resembling white sugar, for which it has been very often mistaken. The tests for the salts of lead are applicable to all salts.

The acetate of lead is very soluble in cold water, and four parts of water will dissolve one part of the salt. One remarkable property of this salt in solution is that the liquid is both acid and alkaline, which appears quite paradoxical. No clear explanation has been given of this, but no doubt the oxide of lead is capable of combination with vegetable acids, and preserving its alkaline reaction. A very good way of testing it is to place a small quantity of iodide of potassium in a glass, and add a few grains of the suspected substance, and a brownish-yellow deposit is obtained, which is the iodide of lead. The acetate of lead is also turned black by adding a little of the powder to hydro-sulphuret of ammonia. The tests for this salt in solution are several; i.e. potass, sulphuric acid, iodide of potassium, and the hydro-sulphuret of ammonia, or sulphuretted hydrogen. Potash gives a white precipitate with oxide of lead. This will throw down an immense number of bodies, but oxide of lead is entirely soluble in potash, whereby we distinguish it from magnesia, lime, and many other bodies. Iodide of potassium gives a bright yellow deposit of a gamboge colour, which preserves these two remarkable properties; that it is entirely soluble in caustic potash, and forms a colourless solution, like water. Iodide of lead ought to be entirely soluble in muriatic acid. Sulphuric acid gives a white precipitate with oxide of lead. Sulphate of lead is insoluble in strong nitric acid, like barytes; but it differs from the sulphate of barytes in being entirely soluble in caustic potash, and also in strong muriatic acid. Hydro-sulphuret of ammonia, or sulphuretted hydrogen, gives a dense black precipitate of sulphuret of lead, and by this test we discover lead in the proportion of 1-500,000th part. There is another point important to notice in relation to the precipitates of lead, from whatever source, that they are all turned black by the hydro-sulphuret of ammonia. We have therefore the power of applying three different tests to one proportion of the liquid; and these tests taken together are entirely free from objection, which, when taken separately, they are liable to, especially the hydro-sulphuret of ammonia, because it deposits many bodies black. The salts of lead are easily reduced to the metallic state by fusion, by chemical affinity, or by galvanism. The acids of lead are also very easily distinguished. The acetate melts when heated, resembling tartar emetic in this respect, and the vapour of acetic acid is given off. Nitrate of lead melts and gives off red acid vapour, which is nitrous acid; and a yellow residue is left, which is the protoxide of lead. Chloride of lead melts, but gives off no acid vapour; but it leaves a yellowish greenish mass. Carbonate of lead (the other insoluble salt) is a substance that has given rise to many cases of accidental poisoning. It is called white lead, and many other names, and presents itself in chalky uncrystallized masses. This is the body that gives the poisonous properties to water. It is identified by muriatic acid, which dissolves it with effervescence. It is also soluble in caustic potash, and is blackened by hydro-sulphuret of ammonia. It is easily reduced to the metallic state. Carbonate of lead is extensively used in the manufacture of glazed cards, now much in use, and from the introduction of which many accidents have arisen. Within the last week or ten days a case of poisoning by lead occurred under the form of glazier's putty. Now, in the proper state, glazier's putty has no lead in it. It was proved, however, that the boy had some putty in his possession, and that his death was caused by eating it.

The last point we have to consider is with regard to the detection of lead in organic matters. This is a matter of some difficulty, unless the poison happens to be in pretty large quantities. The oxide of lead combines with tannin, albumen, and almost all organic substances rendered by them. In order to examine an organic liquid suspected to contain oxide of lead, the liquid should be separated into small portions. If a piece of filtering-paper be dipped in one portion until it is saturated, and then exposed to the action of sulphuretted hydrogen, should lead be present, a brown stain is produced. The gas may now be passed into the liquid; a black precipitate falls, which may be converted into a soluble salt of lead by boiling it with diluted nitric acid. The filtered liquid may be tested with sulphuric acid, then by potash and the hydro-sulphuret of ammonia, when the usual effects will be produced. There are also many other ways of reducing the lead; as, for instance, by calcining the dried stomach or intestines with three or four parts of black flux, metallic globules will be formed in the carbonaceous residue.

LAWS OF FRANCE.

No. X.

OF THE COURS ROYALES, OR COURTS OF APPEAL.

The Roman law defines the appeal thus:—Appellatio est iniquitatis sententiæ querela.

We have already stated in our preceding articles, that in France we have two degrees of jurisprudence; that is to say, two classes of tribunals before which the same case can be successively carried.

The object of the legislation being to secure to citizens the most entire possible justice, it was thought that, by placing above one court another court superior in numbers, and generally more enlightened, it would be difficult for error to escape the revisal; but, in order that lawsuits should not be perpetuated, the law has limited to two the degrees of jurisprudence; for we shall find that the Court of Cassation does not form a third. The first degree of jurisprudence is fulfilled by the Civil District Courts and Courts of Commerce, in all matters which come under their jurisdiction. All cases, except those judged without appeal, as we have already explained, are carried before the Cours Royales when an appeal has been lodged; these form the second degree of jurisprudence.

France is divided into twenty-seven Cours Royales, which take cognizance of the appeals of a certain number of tribunals of First Instance; these courts united form the district (ressort) of the jurisdiction of each Cour Royale.

The judges of these superior courts are called "Counsellers of his Majesty at the Cour Royale of ———." Their number varies from 24 to 60, according to the number of cases to be judged with appeal.

The Cours Royales are divided into chambers, which cannot sit with less than seven counsellors. Certain important cases, such as state affairs, that is, those concerning the civil rights (l'état civil) of individuals, are judged in audience solennelle, a court composed of two chambers, and where the judges wear their red robes.

These courts have a head recorder (greffier en chef) and as many recorder clerks as there are chambers, and a fixed number of attorneys and vergers (huissiers), who have the exclusive right of acting and drawing up deeds for these courts.

The delay allowed for lodging an appeal is three months; for contradictory judgments it begins from the day of the personal signification, or of the signification at domicile; for judgments by default, from the day the opposition can no longer be received.*

The party who has gained at the Court of First Instance can also bring in an appeal.

At the expiration of these delays all rights are forfeited: they are in full force against all parties, save those who have redress against them; but they only begin for the minor not emancipated from the day the judgment is signified to the second trustee, as well as to the guardian, although the former had not appeared in the cause. For those residing out of continental France, the delay for lodging an appeal, beyond the term of three months after the signification of the judgment, shall be—

1st. Two months for those residing in Corsica, Elba, or Capraia, in England, or in those states bordering upon France.

2nd. Four months for those residing in other parts of Europe.

3rd. Six months for those residing out of Europe, on this side the Cape of Good Hope.

4th. A year for those residing beyond it.

And those who are absent from the European territory of the kingdom, on service by land or by sea, or otherwise employed in outward negotiations for the state, are allowed the delay of a twelvemonth beyond the term of three months after the signification of the judgment.

The delays for the appeal are suspended by the death of the condemned party.

They only take their course after the signification of the judgment at the domicile of the deceased, with the formalities prescribed by Art. 61, and beginning only from the expiration of the delays allowed the heirs for taking the inventory or for deliberating on the acceptance or the renunciation of the inheritance, if the judgment has been signified before the expiration of these delays.

The signification can be made to the heirs collectively, and without designation of names and titles.

In the case of a judgment being given on a false document, if the party has been condemned for want of shewing a decisive document in the hands of his adversary, the delays for the appeal will only take their course after the error has been recognized and legally proved or the deed recovered, provided that in the latter case there is proof by writing of where the document has been recovered, and not otherwise.

Litigants are compelled to a week's calm; they cannot lodge an appeal during the eight days which follow the announcement of the judgment.

Appeals lodged during this delay are not received, but the appealing party can reiterate them within the allowed delay.

The execution of judgments which are not provisionally executory is suspended during the said week.

The appeal of a preparatory judgment cannot be lodged until after the definitive judgment, and conjointly with the appeal of this judgment, and the delay for the appeal only commences from the day of the signification of the definitive judgment: the appeal can be received even although the preparatory judgment has been unreservedly executed.

The appeal against an interlocutory judgment can be lodged before the definitive judgment has been rendered.

Preparatory judgments are those given for the information of the case, and which assist in preparing it for the reception of the definitive judgment.

Interlocutory judgments are those given before the definitive judgment, and by which the Court ordains a proof, a verification, or an information which prejudges the main point (fond).

Judgments called without appeal are submitted to appeal when they are given by judges, who can only pronounce in first instance.

But appeals are not admitted against judgments given on cases, the judgments without appeal of which belong to the first judges who have omitted to qualify them as such, or who have called them judgments with appeal.

* The opposition is the means of reforming a judgment by which a person has been condemned without having presented himself or offered any defence. See Arts. 20, 113, and 149 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

Whenever it is for cause of incompetency, the appeal is always admitted, the competency of the courts being the law of France.

The appeal must contain an assignation within the delays allowed by the law, and must be signified personally or at domicile, under penalty of invalidity.

The appeal suspends the execution of the judgment, excepting in cases where the law authorizes the judges to pronounce the provisional execution, independent of opposition or appeal.

If the provisional execution has not been pronounced in cases where it is authorized, the defendant in the appeal can, on demand, compel the Court to ordain it before the judgment of the appeal.

If the provisional execution has been ordained in cases not admitted by the law, the appealing party can obtain a prohibition from the Court upon a short assignation.

In no other case can a prohibition be granted or a judgment rendered tending directly or indirectly to stop the execution of a judgment, under penalty of invalidity.

In the week during which a lawyer is provided by the defendant of the appeal, the appealing party signifies his objections against the judgment; the defendant replies the following week, and the Court takes proceedings without further procedure.

In the appeal, no additional demand must be made, unless a compensation is the object, or unless the demand is the defence of the principal action. Parties can also demand the interest, arrears, rents, and other payments arising since the judgment in First Instance, also damages for loss or injury sustained since the said judgment.

In the above-mentioned cases, the additional demands are made by the simple statement of the defendant's reasons, as also in cases where the parties wish to alter or modify their conclusions.

Where more than two opinions are formed, the judges weakest in number are compelled to unite themselves to one of the two opinions expressed by the largest number, and in case of a division of the Cour Royale, to decide it, one or several judges who have not had knowledge of the case, and always in uneven numbers, are called in, and the affair is tried again.

The loser in the appeal is condemned to a fine of five francs, if it be an appeal against the judgment of a justice of peace; to ten francs, if the appeal is against a judgment of a Court of First Instance, or a Commercial Court.

If the judgment is confirmed, the execution of it belongs to the court which first pronounced it: if the judgment is annulled, the execution of the one rendered belongs to the Cour Royale, which pronounces it on to another court indicated by the decree.

When there is an appeal against an interlocutory judgment, if the judgment is annulled and the case ready to receive a final judgment, the Cours Royales and other courts of appeal can pronounce their decision at the same time they annul the first judgment.

The same thing is done in cases where the Cours Royales and other courts of appeal annul definitive judgments for a flaw in the formality (vice de forme), or any other cause.

Such are the principal tenets which regulate the procedure of the courts of appeal, the highest of which is the Court of Cassation, of which we shall treat in our next article.

THE CRITIC.

New Books.

The Law of Fixtures, with reference to Real Property and Chattels of a personal nature. To which is also added, the Law of Dilapidations, ecclesiastical and lay. By Standish Grove Grady, Esq. of the Middle Temple, Barrister-at-Law. London, 1845. O. Richard

Although the Law of Fixtures is treated at some length in Chitty's Contracts, and in the best works on the Law of Landlord and Tenant, a volume specially devoted to the subject will probably be a useful addition to the library.

Mr. Grady has exhibited considerable industry in the composition of his treatise. He has diligently collected all the cases and arranged them under appropriate divisions, so as to present to the reader the entire law upon the subject in its proper order, and copiously indexed.

Having treated of fixtures in general, he reviews the right to fixtures possessed by various parties, according to their several interests; then of the right to remove them; of their sale and transfer, and of the rights, liabilities, and exemptions of parties in respect of fixtures. A distinct chapter is devoted to the law relating to heirlooms and chattels in nature thereof—charters, deeds, &c. The first book closes with a consideration of the time when fixtures should be removed, and the liability to repair injury caused by their removal The second book treats of the legal and equitable remedies in respect of fixtures, and of the time within which the action must be brought; of the application of the criminal law to fixtures, and of their survey and valuation.

The third book is dedicated to the subject of dilapidations, both lay and ecclesiastical, the liabilities of different parties, and the remedies in law and equity.

The first chapter, "Of Fixtures in General," will favourably shew the manner in which Mr. Grady has performed his undertaking, and will interest and instruct our readers.

OF FIXTURES IN GENERAL.

Definition.—Fixture is a word of ambiguous signification: it is, however, used to denote chattels of a personal nature which have been affixed to land.

In this work "fixtures" is considered with reference to such inanimate things of a personal nature as have become affixed or annexed to the realty, but but which may be severed, disunited, or removed by the party, or his personal representative, who has so affixed them without the consent of the owner of the freehold.(a) (Per Parke, B. 1 C. M. & R. 276.)

Exception to general rule.—This definition is to be considered as an exception to the general rule, quicquid plantatur solo, solo cedit. Whatever is affixed to the realty is thereby made parcel of it, and partakes of all its incidents and properties. (See Hardwick, C. in Dudley v. Ward, Ambl. 113; Lord Ellenborough, in Elwes v. Maw, 3 East, 57; Parke, B. in Hallen v. Runder, 1 C. M. & R. 275; Minshall v. Lloyd, 2 M. & W. 459; Lee v. Risden, 7 Taunt. 191.)

What sufficient annexation.—The question naturally arises, What particular species of annexation will confer upon goods the character of fixtures within the above definition? The merely laying and resting upon the earth, without letting and imbedding them into it, goods, or even buildings, of whatsoever description, will not confer upon them the right to become fixtures. The article must be fixed in or to the ground, or some substance already become a portion of the freehold, in order to deprive it of its personal nature. Thus, in the case of Elwes v. Maw (3 East, 38), where a tenant in agriculture, who erected at own expe and for the mere necessary and nt occupation of his farm, a beast-house, carpenter's shop, fuel-house, cart-house, pump-house, and fold-yard wall, which buildings were of brick and mortar and tiled, and let into the ground, it was held that he could not remove them, even during his term, and although he left the premises in the same state as when he entered. So also in Horne, Exr. v. Baker, Ass. (9 East, 215), which involved the question as to the right of assignees of a bankrupt to goods and chattels which were in his order and disposition under the 21 Jac. 1, c. 19, ss. 10. 11. The property in question consisted of certain stills, which were set in brick-work and let into the ground, also some vats or worm-tubs which were supported by and rested upon brick-work and timber, but were not fixed in the ground; and also some other vats which stood on horse frames made of wood, which were not let into the ground, but stood upon the floor; and the Court held that those vats which were fixed to the freehold did not pass to the assignees under the words goods and chattels in the statute.

So, where the tenant had erected a verandah, the lower part of which was attached to posts fixed in the ground, Abbott, J. held that the tenant could not it. (Penry, Admix. v. Brown, 2 Stark. N. P. C. 403.)(b)

The foregoing cases shew distinctly what will be considered a sufficient annexation to the soil, to prevent the removal therefrom of a chattel which has been affixed thereto.

What is not a sufficient annexation.—But should this complete annexation to the freehold not take place, the articles are not within the class of cases already cited, and are not what are usually called fixtures; they remain mere personal chattels, and may be removed by the party who brought them upon the premises. Thus, in the case of Culling v. Tuffnall (Buller's N. P. 34), where it was held that the tenant who had erected a barn upon the premises, and put it upon pattens and blocks of timber lying upon the ground, but not fixed in or to the ground, might, by the custom of the country, take them away at the end of his term; but as Lord Ellenborough, in Elwes v. Maw (3 East, 38), said, "To be sure he might, for the terms of the statement exclude them from being considered as fixtures, they were not fixed in or to the ground." (See also Nayler v. Colling, 1 Taunt. 21.) So in Horn v. Baker (ante),(c) those vats, &c. which were not fixed to the freehold were held to pass to the assignees, as being in the order and disposition of the bankrupt. So in Davis et al. v. Jones et al. (2 B. & Al. 165), certain parts of a machine which had been put up by the tenant during his term, and which were capable of being removed without either injuring the other parts of the machine or the building, and had been usually valued between outgoing and incoming tenant, were held to be the goods and chattels of the outgoing tenant, for which he might maintain trover, the Court of King's Bench was of opinion that, at least between landlord and tenant, the question depended on a conclusion of facts to be drawn from the matters stated in the case, and not upon any point of law; and therefore, that the jibs (which were certain uprights that were placed in certain caps or steps of timber fixed into a building, and which turned round the work in these caps or steps), from their mode of construction, were not properly fixtures at all, but mere personal chattels.

Where resting on brick foundation.—It should seem, also, that if goods or buildings are merely placed and rest upon, without being let into, a brick or other foundation, and can be taken away without injury to such foundation, they may legally be removed, although the foundation itself be in a solid manner rendered part of the freehold, and cannot be severed therefrom, and were constructed for the express purpose of supporting the superincumbent weight. Rex v. Otley, Inhabs. (1 B. & Ad. 161), in which case it was held, that a wooden windmill placed upon, but not let into, a brick foundation, was removable by a tenant. So in the case of Wansbrough v. Maton (4 Ad. & E. 884, 6 N. & M. 367),(d) where a wooden barn had been erected on a foundation of brick and stone, the foundation being let into the ground, but the barn resting upon it by weight alone. So where a tenant had built upon part of the land a post windmill, constructed upon cross traces laid upon brick pillars, but not attached or affixed thereto, it was held that this windmill was a mere chattel, and not to be considered as connected with the land. (Rex v. Londonthorpe, 6 T. R. 377.)

It follows from the foregoing cases, therefore, that wherever a chattel is perfectly connected with the freehold, either by being let into the earth itself, or by being cemented or otherwise united to some erection previously attached to the ground, it becomes part of the freehold itself, and cannot be removed by the tenant or his representative.

Tenant may make erections removable.—And that a tenant may so construct any erection he may make, as to avoid the application of the above rule: thus, he may erect barns, granaries, sheds, and mills upon blocks, rollers, pattens, pillars, or plates resting on brickwork, so as to reserve to himself the right of removal.

Exceptions to general rule.—To the general rule, quicquid plantatur solo, solo cedit, many exceptions have been made. The question therefore suggests itself, what particular rules or exceptions regulate the right of removal between persons standing in different relative situations towards each other, in respect to the premises to which the goods have been united? It has been stated, that whenever any thing is affixed to the freehold, neither the party annexing it nor his personal representative can ever again sever it, without the consent of the reversioner; the property, by being annexed to the land, immediately belongs to the freeholder, and the tenant, by making it a part of the freehold, is considered to abandon all future right to it, so that it would be waste in him to remove it afterwards; it therefore falls in with the term, and comes to the reversioner as part of the land. (Herlakenden's case, 4 Rep. 64; Co. Litt. 53; Cooke v. Humphrey, Moore, 177; Darby (Lord) v. Asquith, Hob. 234.)

(a) See the case of Sheen v. Richie 5 M. & W. 175, where the declaration was in trover for goods, chattels, and fixtures (enumerating, amongst other moveable articles, stoves, shelves, &c.), and it was held, after verdict (general damages having been assessed on the whole declaration), that the "fixtures" would not necessarily be taken to mean things affixed to the freehold; and therefore the judgment ought not to be arrested.

(b) In this case the tenant covenanted to repair, and keep in repair, the premises and all erections, buildings, and improvements which might be erected thereon during the term, and yield up the same in good and sufficient repair.

(c) In confirmation of this decision, see Clark v. Crownshaw (3 B. & Ad. 804); Coombs v. Beaumont (5 B. & Ad. 72); Boydell v. Mitchell (1 C. M. & R. 177; 3 Tyrwh. 970); Rufford v. Bishop (5 Russ. 346); Hubbard v. Bagshaw (4 Sim. 326).

(d) Trover lies for the conversion of such an erection, though it does not lie for fixtures (id.); and see Mackintosh v. Trotter (3 M. & W. 184).

On this general rule, certain exceptions have been engrafted with reference to the purpose and object for which the article has been annexed to the land.

1st. In favour of trade, of agriculture, of ornament and convenience, or of general improvement of the estate. It is upon these grounds generally that the Courts have upheld the doctrine of property in fixtures; but they are not the only considerations on which the question has turned.

Custom.—For we find that custom, as in Culling v. Tuffnell (Bull. N. P. 34); Davis v. Jones (2 B. & Ald. 165); and see Wetherell v. Howells (1 Campb. 227); Trapps v. Harter (3 Tyrwh. 603); Went. Off. Exrs. 61.

Nature of fixture.—The nature of the article affixed. (See Lord Hardwick, in Lawton v. Lawton, 3 Atk. 14; and see Thresher v. East London Water-Works Company, 2 B. & C. 608.)

Intention.—The intention of the party in attaching to the freehold, as in Lawton v. Lawton (supra); Salmon v. Lawton (1 H. Bl. 260). (See Buckland v. Butterfield, 2 B. & B. 56.)

Injury.—Injury to the freehold in case of removal. (21 H. 7, 26; Cooke v. Humphrey, supra; Lawton v. Lawton, supra; Dudley v. Warde, 1 Amb. 113; Davis v. Jones, supra; Every v. Cheslyn, 3 Ad. & E. 75.)

Advantage to estate.—The advantages derivable to the estate. Lawton v. Lawton (ante); Dudley v. Warde (ante); Lawton v. Salmon (ante), have been respectively relied on.

Few decisions, therefore, can be considered absolute authorities in other instances, even of fixtures of a similar denomination. Every case of this sort must depend upon its own special and peculiar circumstances. (Per Dallas, C. J., Buckland v. Butterfield, 1 B. & B. 58.)

Belper, near Derby,

Respectfully returns his acknowledgments for the favours he has received since his commencement in business, and trusts that the recent alterations in the "Law on Public Sales" will in future greatly facilitate the disposal of property.

 The general dependance of Auctioneers on Solicitors, engaged in the disposal of Estates; whose professional commands were not unfrequently obtained by the auctioneer at a sacrifice of part of the "commission" charged on such occasions; together with the inconveniences of a serious "tax," which all parties were equally anxious to avoid; have unquestionably been the cause of much delay, and a most serious expense to the seller; which the "enlightened views," and "real liberality" of our present Government have now rendered it unnecessary to incur, by the absolute repeal of the "Auction Duty," thereby enabling individuals to realize the "full value" of property with expedition, and at a "moderate expense."

Mr. H. submits to his friends and the public; that he will be found fully prepared, and qualified to secure to the "sellers of property" the advantages of the late enactment, by strict attention to their interest in the "price" and to the exclusion of the many charges and expenses" heretofore incidental to the "transfer of estates."

Orders for the "Sale or Purchase" of any description of property by private contract; will also be executed with that fidelity, dispatch, and attention to the interest of his "principals" which has during eleven years practice (on his own account) secured to him on every occasion the unlimited approbation of his employers; and he earnestly assures his friends and the public, that in all "Sales and Valuations," of real or personal property; it will ever be his study to use the best of his judgment; and to endeavour to merit a continuation of that patronage with which he has hitherto been honoured: than whom, no man of the like standing in business ever received a greater share, and (with the many recent proofs of unabated public confidence) which he is proud to acknowledge with sentiments of gratitude, and equally anxious in future to deserve.

Estates Surveyed and Plans executed with neatness and accuracy.

Partnership or Bankruptcy accounts arranged and written up.

Valuations between in-coming and off-going tenants of lands, public houses.

A Registry kept of public-houses, and premises to let.

Furniture, &c. purchased, where parties objected to a sale on the premises.

THE REPORTS.

Equity Courts.

VICE-CHANCELLOR OF ENGLAND'S COURT.

Wednesday, July 23.

Practice—Taxation of costs—Retaining fee.

Where one of the parties in a suit had employed a counsel from the Common Law Bar, and had given him a special retaining fee for coming into the Court of Chancery in addition to the fee endorsed upon his brief, both which the Taxing Master allowed, Held, upon a petition of the defendants, that such special fee ought to be disallowed; that the Court could not interfere to restrain a party in the choice of counsel, and that therefore the petition must be refused with costs.

In this suit the defendants presented their petition, praying that a fee of fifty guineas, given as a special retainer to the then Attorney-General, Sir F. Pollock, might be declared to have been improperly allowed, and that the Taxing Master ought to have disallowed the same; and that it might be referred back to the Master to review his certificate of taxation.

This was an injunction suit, commenced in the year 1843, to restrain the infringement of a patent. On the 28th July, a notice of motion for the 10th of August was served on the petitioners. The motion was made on the 23rd August following, when an arrangement was entered into between the counsel on both sides, that an order should be taken for a trial at law, the petitioners keeping an account in the mean time. A trial was accordingly had, and a verdict was found for the plaintiff. This was followed by a decree in the suit, dated the 14th February, 1845, for an injunction, and for the usual accounts; and it was ordered to be referred to the Taxing Master in rotation to tax the plaintiff's costs of the suit; and when so taxed, the same should be paid by the defendant. The Taxing Master, by his certificate, bearing date the 10th May, 1845, allowed, as part of the costs of the motion, a fee of fifty guineas, also a further fee of 32*l.* 10*s.* to Sir F. Pollock and his clerk.

The Petitioners stated that Sir F. Pollock, the then attorney-general, was not in the habit of practising in the Court of Chancery, and that the fee of fifty guineas so allowed was stated by the plaintiff's solicitor to have been a special retaining fee required by the then Attorney-General for coming into the Court of Chancery on occasion of the motion. They submitted, that they were advised that it was not in accordance with the practice of the Court, upon taxing the costs of a suit as between party and party, to allow a fee as a special retainer to counsel practising in another court for coming into the Chancery Courts, in addition to an adequate fee upon his brief. That it had been objected before the Master, that it was not according to the practice of the Court to allow such special fee, but that the Master did allow it on an affidavit made by the managing clerk of the plaintiff's solicitor, in which he deposed that, in consequence of the then advanced state of the vacation, he was unable to secure the services of any leading gentleman at the Chancery Bar to make the motion, and that in consequence thereof, and of the petitioners having secured the services of the late Solicitor-General, the plaintiff had no alternative but to retain the then Attorney-General to appear on the motion on his behalf.

On behalf of the petitioners, the affidavit of their solicitor's managing clerk deposed, that he had made inquiry at the chambers of Mr. Wakefield, and had been informed by his clerk, and verily believed that Mr. Wakefield was in town on the 23rd of August, 1843, and would have accepted a brief to argue a motion for an injunction, if the same had been tendered to him, without the payment of the special fee of fifty guineas. That he had also inquired of Mr. Oliver Anderton's clerk, of Mr. Kenyon Parker's clerk, and of Sir Charles Wetherell's clerk, and received similar answers from each.

Stuart and Follett, in support of the petition, contended that the case was one of ordinary merits, and might have been argued by any Queen's Council at the Chancery bar,—there was therefore no necessity for travelling into the common law courts simply to gratify the capricious fancy of the plaintiff by obtaining the services of a common law counsel who required a fifty guinea fee in addition to the other fee marked on his brief. By such conduct the petitioners, together with the loss of this suit, were mulcted in a fine of fifty guineas. The affidavit made on behalf of the petitioners shewed that there was no lack of eminent Queen's Council practising at the Chancery bar, who could have been found at their chambers, and whose services the plaintiff might have secured; and that, therefore, the objection that there was no leading member of the Chancery bar at the time in town was untenable. Moreover, if it were necessary to the success of the motion that a crown lawyer should be retained, the plaintiff might have been accommodated, even among the Queen's Counsel practising at the Chancery bar, in the person of Sir Charles Wetherell, who had some years ago occupied the distinguished post of his Majesty's Attorney-General. Under these circumstances no necessity had arisen for the course which the plaintiff had pursued, and if he must needs indulge his humour at the extra cost of fifty guineas, the expense of so doing ought not to fall upon the petitioners.

Bethell, to oppose the petition, was not called upon by the Court.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—It appears to me that the objection is not raised on account of the fee being excessive; but merely because some eminent counsel in this court had not been retained, the taxing master ought not to have allowed the fee. Now if the objection was made to the counsel, it ought to have been raised at the time. My opinion upon the subject is this; namely, that a serious blow would be given to the liberties of the people of England, as represented by the body of counsel, if I were to interfere in the manner sought for in this petition, and to declare that every suitor who may come into this court shall not exercise his liberty of choosing his own counsel.

Petition refused with costs.

ROLLS COURT.

May 26 and Aug. 9.

LOVE v. GAZE.

Will—Construction—Stat. 11 Geo. 4, & 1 Will. 4, c. 40, operation of—Residue, express disposition of. A testator bequeathed certain houses to J. G. "and all rents due at my death of all my houses I will and bequeath G. G. and C. G. my two executors, to them I do give all my money on mortgage, &c. all my, &c. all I am worth at my death, for you to pay all as follows," and then bequeathed several legacies. It was held that the residue after payment of legacies, did not belong to the executors beneficially, but that they must be deemed trustees of it for the next of kin, under the 11 Geo. 4, c. 40, there being no manifestation of intention by the testator to give it to the executors beneficially.

William Wiseman duly made his will, bearing date the 1st day of April, 1842, as follows:—"St. Pancras, Middlesex, April 21st, 1842, in the year of Lord. I, William Wiseman, being of a sound disposing mind and memory, God be praised for it. I do make and ordain this to be my last will and testament, in manner and form as following; that is to say, I do consecrate and appoint George Gaze and Charles Gaze to be my two executors of this my last will and testament; I will and bequeath 20*l.* a year to be paid to my nephew Kelah Love, out of the rents of my houses in York-place, Ossulston-street, Somers Town, Middlesex, as long as he lives; I will and bequeath all my houses in York-place to my nephew John Gaze, and all rents that are due at the time of my death of all my houses in York-place, &c. I will and bequeath George Gaze and Charles Gaze my two executors; to them I do give all my money on mortgage-bond on houses or lands; all my money, close [clothes], all I am with [worth], at my death; that is to say, for you to pay all as follows; and I will and bequeath" several legacies to different persons; among others, 10*l.* to his nephew Kelah Love, the plaintiff; and then he adds: "I wish all this to be paid in six months after my death. I here declare this my last will and testament in all our presents" [presence]. In September 1842, the testator died, and on the 20th of April, 1843, the executors, George and Charles Gaze proved the will, and after paying expenses, legacies, &c. there remained a balance of only 322*l.* 7*s.* 8*d.* to which they claimed to be beneficially entitled under the will. It appears that Kelah Love, the plaintiff, had been the testator's agent, and had received his rents for him for some time previously to his death; but on the 1st of October, 1842, he ceased to do so, and John Gaze, the devisee, entered into possession of the houses with the consent of the executors. On the 5th of December, 1842, a meeting was appointed by the executors for the 23rd of the same month, to have a settlement of the plaintiff's accounts; but the plaintiff wrote to say he could not attend, stating, however, that the balance due by him, after deducting his legacy of 10*l.* was only 16*l.* 9*s.* 4*d.* whereas it was said to be a larger sum. Nothing more was done till the 26th of March, 1844, when the plaintiff filed his bill against the executors, George and Charles Gaze, and against Elizabeth Wiseman and Charles Smith and Susanna his wife, Elizabeth Wiseman and Susanna Smith being nieces and next of kin of the testator. The bill stated the will and death of the testator, and alleging that the plaintiff and Elizabeth Wiseman and Susanna Smith were entitled, as next of kin of the testator, to the residue of his estate, after payment of expenses, legacies, &c. prayed for an account of the personal estate, including leasehold houses, &c.; also an account of what was received by the first two defendants; that the plaintiff should be declared to be entitled to an annuity of 20*l.* and a legacy of 10*l.* and, as one of the next of kin, to one-third of the residue; that the construction of the will should be declared, and that a receiver should be appointed, and for an inquiry, &c. The defendants, the executors, by their answer, submitted that by the true construction of the will, they were themselves beneficially entitled to the residue. Several witnesses, also, deposed to having heard the testator say, "he had left all his money, &c. and every thing he was possessed of, to George and Charles Gaze, whom he had made his executors, for them to pay all bills, &c. and legacies, and what was left would be for them; he intended they should have more than than the others, because they would have more trouble." But there was no corresponding allegation in the answer. The executors were the sons of John Gaze, the devisee, who was not really the nephew of the testator, though by him so called. The cause now came on to be heard, and it appearing that there had been (by the consent of the parties) no inquiry as to who were the next of kin, the Court, nevertheless, though reluctantly, allowed it to be proceeded with, as the fund in question was so small.

Turner (with him G. L. Russell), for the plaintiff, contended that the executors were trustees for the next of kin, under the statute 11 Geo. 4 & 1 Will. 4, c. 40, which enacts that executors shall be deemed to be trustees for the next of kin "in respect of any residue not expressly disposed of," unless it should appear by the will that the testator intended them to take beneficially. He also insisted that parol evidence was not admissible to shew the intention, as well because that must "appear by the will," according to the Act, as that there was no corresponding allegation in the answer. He cited Braddon v. Furd (4 Russell, 87); Robinson v. Taylor (2 Bro. C. C. 589); Mullen v. Bowman (1 Coll. C. C. 197).

Moore, for the other next of kin.

Kindersley (with him Terrell), for the executors, contended that the residue was expressly disposed of, and the case was therefore not within the statute. He cited Lynn v. Beaver (1 Tur. & Russ. 66).

Turner, in reply.

The MASTER of the ROLLS.—Whatever may be the extent of the operation of the statute, it will be very small indeed, and its application very narrow, if the construction contended for by the defendants, the executors, be established. The statute says, executors shall be deemed trustees for the persons entitled under the Statute of Distributions, in respect of any residue not expressly disposed of, unless an intention appear by the will that they should take beneficially. What is meant by an express disposition of the residue? It is said that a gift of all the testator's property, after certain payments to be made thereout, imports and involves a gift of the residue: and no doubt it indirectly does so. Here the testator gives an annuity of 20*l.* and the sum of 10*l.* to his nephew, the plaintiff; then he gives the houses to John Gaze; and then he bequeaths all he is worth at his death to his two executors, "for you to pay all, &c.;" and then he bequeaths legacies to several persons. Is, then, that disposition "an express disposition of the residue?" It is said, the Act is confined to cases where the executor takes only by his appointment as executor, and by virtue of his office. If that be so, the legislature has not saved much of the public time in cases of this sort. I will consider.

Saturday, August 9.—The MASTER of the ROLLS, after stating the case, observed that the intention of the testator, that the executors should take beneficially, must necessarily appear before they could be entitled to do so under the Act; and that he was unable to discover such manifestation of intention in this case. He was of opinion, therefore, that the case came clearly within the operation of the Act; and the executors must be held not to be entitled beneficially, and consequently they were to be deemed trustees of the residue for the next of kin.

BAINBRIDGE v. BLAIR.

Practice—Trustee who is a solicitor—Compensation for time and trouble—Bills of costs for suits conducted in regard to the trust property—General rule respecting, and when relaxed.

A trustee, who is a solicitor, and in such capacity conducts suits for himself and co-trustees in respect of the trust property, is entitled only to actual disbursements, and not to such costs, charges, &c. as he would be entitled to in his professional capacity, if he was merely employed as solicitor in the cause, and was not a trustee.

This general rule, however, admits of exceptions, and may be deviated from for the benefit of the trust, where, in particular cases, the deviation may be safely allowed, without breaking through the authority of the rule.

But such deviations must be authorized by the Court, on a proper application, on its being satisfied that the time and trouble of the trustee are of so much consequence to the trust-fund that it is better to pay for them than lose them, or the testator may himself order compensation.

The trustee, however, in such a case, ought to apply before taking any steps, and not wait to have the costs allowed under the just allowances clause in the decree for an account.

Mr. Blair was the solicitor of the testator in the cause for a long time previously to his death, and was intimately acquainted with his affairs, and his confidential agent and adviser. The testator died in June, 1818, having by his will bequeathed and devised his real and personal estate for the benefit of certain cestui que trusts, as therein mentioned, and having appointed Mr. Blair and two other persons executors and trustees to carry out the trusts of the will. All the three proved the will, but Mr. Blair was the acting trustee, and took upon himself the entire management and direction of the property, and of the various suits and other matters relating thereto. The testator by his will gave Mr. Blair 200*l*. by way of compensation, and allowed him the use of a house, for himself and an infant cestui que trust, together with an annuity for keeping the infant, and the liberty to kill game, &c. The real estate produced upwards of 2,000*l*. a year, and Mr. Blair continued to receive the rents from 1818 till 1829, when a receiver in a suit then instituted was appointed. At the time of his death the testator was engaged in a foreclosure suit, which Mr. Blair subsequently brought to a successful issue, and had entered into a contract as to certain property, which ended in a suit also favourably concluded by Mr. Blair. In 1829 the heir-at-law set up a claim to the real estate, impeaching the will, on the ground of the insanity of the testator, but the bill was dismissed. It became necessary, however, in 1830, to institute a suit to establish the will, which was accordingly done, and in 1835 a decree was made that the will should be established and the trusts of it carried into execution; and a reference was accordingly ordered to be made to the Master to take the accounts, &c. making all just allowances. In this suit, as well as in several other suits and actions at law (amounting to about ten in number), Mr. Blair was the acting trustee, and the solicitor for the trustees, and, it was alleged, mainly contributed to preserve the property for the cestui que trusts, who would have been left entirely destitute but for h[illegible] extraordinary exertions in conducting the suits, in all of which he was successful. It was also alleged that he had raised money to assist in carrying on the suits, &c. which could not otherwise have been raised, and that the testator's estate was indebted to him to a large amount, he having now for seven years received nothing. On the other hand it was alleged that Mr. Blair's disbursements were made entirely out of the rents and profits of the estates, of which he had received over 20,000*l*. and that he was indebted to the testator's estate. Though the decree for an account, &c. had been made so long as 1835, yet it appeared that it was not yet determined how the balance stood; but the order of reference being carried in before Sir William Horne, and, under the head of all just allowances, claims being made for certain bills of costs in respect of the suits and actions at law, Sir William Horne applied to one of the taxing-masters for his opinion as to the just allowances to be made. The taxing-master refused to allow any thing more than actual disbursements, inasmuch as, being a trustee, Mr. Blair was not entitled to any remuneration for his professional services, which it was his duty to give gratuitously. Mr. Blair having become bankrupt, the assignees (by agreement of the parties, it appeared) now presented a petition for an inquiry as to whether the suits, &c. were proper or not, and for the advantage of the testator's estate, and that the Master might be directed to consider what allowance should be made in respect of the costs, charges, &c. of Mr. Blair, and for general relief. The petition now came on to be heard.

Turner (with whom was Wright), for the petition, contended that Mr. Blair was entitled to the costs. He had succeeded in saving the estate, had been out of pocket large sums for twenty-seven years, and the interest of that money would be equal to the whole costs asked. Besides, the rule against trustee-solicitors receiving costs, &c. is of modern introduction, and one admitting of relaxation in proper cases, such as where the estate is greatly benefited, as in this case. They cited Marshall v. Holloway (2 Swanst. 432); Carmichael v. Wilson (2 Molloy, 537); York v. Brown (1 Coll. C. C. 260); Ayliff v. Murray (2 Atk. 58); New v. Jones (9 Jarm.); Byth. Conv. 731, 3rd ed.

Kindersley and Daniell, contrà, for the infant plaintiff, the cestui que trust, contended that the decree being for an account, the Master making all just allowances, there was no occasion for any such direction as was asked, to make inquiries, &c. They cited Moore v. Frowd (3 Myl. & Cr. 45); Fraser v. Palmer (4 Younge & Coll. 515); Collins v. Carey (2 Beav. 128).

Turner, in reply.

The MASTER of the ROLLS, after stating the case, observed that the circumstances of the case were not usual, but he was clear in his opinion as to what he ought to do under the circumstances. The parties come before me by agreement to ask whether the general rule existed as the taxing-master had alleged, and whether it ought to be acted on in the present case. It has been urged by counsel for the petition that it is not a general rule. But in New v. Jones it was distinctly declared by Lord Lyndhurst to be a general rule, and that for reasons not disputed since. Next Lord Cottenham, in Moore v. Frowd, has held, with equal precision and force, that such was the general rule; and Mr. Baron Alderson has also acknowledged it, and for good reasons, in Fraser v. Palmer. After, then, three decisions solemnly and deliberately given, it would be too much to suppose that I can treat them as of no authority. A case decided in Ireland prior to those cases has been cited for the petitioners, in which it was reported that Lord Manners had said he consulted Lord Eldon on the point, and that he (Lord E.) had denied such was the rule. This must have been some mistake of the reporter, or of Lord Manners, for I have often heard Lord Eldon say things totally different. I cannot acknowledge that case as any authority, and even if I did, I should feel absolutely bound by the three more recent cases. The next question is, is it a rule which does not admit of exception? I think not; the Court will deviate from its own rules for the benefit of a trust, when, in particular cases, the deviation may be safely allowed without breaking through the authority of the rule. No case or dictum has been referred to in which the solicitor, being a trustee was allowed to charge as a solicitor. Marshall v. Holloway was not a petition to allow a bill of costs, but to consider the propriety of giving some remuneration in that way. I must therefore say that I cannot consider that the Court, even if it deemed it proper to make some allowance, could make it in the way proposed, viz. permitting the gentleman who acted as solicitor for himself and his co-trustees to make out a bill of costs against himself. This would be putting the trustee in too delicate a position with his duty on the one side and his interest on the other. But it is said the case might be one of annual account, and the prayer is for general relief. Suppose so; what is there in the case to induce me to make an order to inquire if the suits were beneficial? It is alleged on one side, that Mr. Blair is out of pocket, and on the other, that he is indebted to the estate; I cannot give credit to either. It is extraordinary that in 1835 an order for an account had been made, and now, in 1845, it was not ascertained on which side the balance really was. It was assumed that, because there is a primâ facie case of benefit, therefore an inquiry ought to be directed. But suppose so, how was it acquired. By the exertions of a trustee; and is he not bound to exert himself? Surely; it is only in strict performance of his duty. It is a very different case where trusts are in the course of being performed, and the services of a particular trustee become necessary to perform them beneficially. If he comes into court and alleges that he cannot devote his time gratuitously to the business, it is competent to the Court to consider whether it is worth while to employ and remunerate him. There are various analogous cases in which the same thing may be done. Mr. Blair, in making the will, might have made a special provision, [or] have omitted the legacy or refused it. Again, when the bill became necessary to establish the will, what hindered Blair from coming to the Court and shewing he was a necessary person to conduct the suit, and that it would be a loss to him to go on without remuneration, and the Court would then have determined the matter; or, at the hearing, he might have petitioned for remuneration, &c. and the Court might have made a special order, instead of the usual direction that all just allowances shall be made. I, therefore, dismiss the petition without costs.

VICE-CHANCELLOR WIGRAM'S COURT.

LLOYD v. MASON.

Husband and wife—Wife's equity to a settlement as against the rights of her husband.

Children's equity to a settlement in right of their mother after her death.

A decree in a suit upon petition on further directions, declaring the wife's equity to a settlement out of a fund coming to her husband in her right, and an order of reference to settle the amount, which reference is afterwards made, under special agreement, to counsel instead of the Master, will be sufficient to establish the right of her children to all the benefit of the award, even though their mother should die before the settlement is completed.

This was a petition of the children of Sarah Mason, the wife of Horatio Mason, a bankrupt, to have their mother's equity to a settlement secured to them after her death, which she had been declared entitled to during her life; the suit in which the petition arose was for the administration of the estate of Ralph Pasington, under whose will Sarah Mason was entitled to one-ninth part of his residuary estate absolutely; during the progress of the suit her husband, Horatio Mason, became a bankrupt, and all his estate and interest in right of his wife was sold by his assignees to Sir Wm. Heygate, and on the cause coming before the Court upon further directions, Sir Wm. Heygate presented a petition to have the whole of Mrs. Mason's share paid to him; Mrs. Mason also appeared by counsel, and asked to have her right to a settlement declared in favour of herself and children; it was ordered that the whole share of Mrs. Mason should be carried to a separate account, to be entitled, the separate account of Mr. and Mrs. Mason, and Sir Wm. Heygate was declared entitled to this share, subject to the right of Mrs. Mason to have a settlement out of it for herself and children, and it was referred to the Master to inquire what would be a proper amount to settle upon Mrs. Mason and her children. The decree for a reference to the Master was not acted upon, in consequence of an amicable proposal which was acceded to by the solicitors for Mrs. Mason and Sir Wm. Heygate, whereby it was referred to the junior counsel on both sides to settle the amount Mrs. Mason was entitled to, and, after consideration, they decided she was entitled to have a moiety of the share settled upon herself and children, and in that decision the solicitors on both sides agreed to, as did also Mrs. Mason. Before the award was finally carried out, Mrs. Mason died, whereupon Sir Wm. Heygate declared the award as void, and claimed the whole fund, upon which the present petition was presented, when the question as to what act of a wife was sufficient to fix her equity to a settlement out of a fund coming to her after marriage gave rise to much discussion, in consequence of the conflicting decisions of Sir John Leach in Sheinmoly v. Hallier (1 Glyn. & Jameson's Rep. 64); and Lord Langdale's in De la Garde v. Lampriere (6 Beavan, 344), in addition to which the cases of Murray v. Ellibank (10 Ves. 84); and Adams v. Lavender (1 M'Clelland & Young, 41), were cited.

Holt, for the petitioners, the children of Mrs. Mason.

Tripp, for Sir Wm. Heygate and other defendants.

His HONOUR.—The circumstances of this case relieve me from the necessity of deciding here between the conflicting decisions of Sir John Leach and Lord Langdale in the cases which have been cited. The question whether the children of Mrs. Mason are entitled to have her equity to a settlement declared in their favour, depends upon whether the husband was bound by the proceedings which have occurred. The facts of the case are these. [His Honour here states the case.] Now it is clear the assignment of the 12th June, 1840, in which the husband joins the assignees, merely assigns the husband's interest in the fund to Sir William Heygate; for the words used are, "all the right, title, and estate of Horatio Mason in and to one-ninth part or share of his wife Sarah Mason;" from which it is clear Mrs. Mason's equity to a settlement was not included in that assignment. Afterwards, upon the cause coming on upon further directions, Sir William Heygate presents his petition, and Mrs. Mason also appears by counsel, and petitions to have her equity to a settlement declared; and the Court decreed Sir William Heygate entitled to the fund, subject to Mrs. Mason's equity to a settlement in favour of herself and children out of it; and the fund was ordered to be carried to the separate account of Mr. and Mrs. Mason. That was enough to decide the question of her right to a settlement. The fund was carried over, and notice was there served to have a reference to settle the wife's equity before the Master, whereupon a negotiation is entered upon between the solicitors for Mrs. Mason and Sir Wm. Heygate, when it was agreed to refer the fixing the amount Mrs. Mason was entitled to out of the fund to the junior counsel in the cause. The reference is made, and Mrs. Mason is awarded one moiety of the fund, subject to the costs. All parties consent to the award; but a few days after, and before the award could be finally carried out, Mrs. Mason died, when Sir Wm. Heygate again claims the whole fund. It is clear the decree would have bound the husband, for the fund was carried over subject to her equity to a settlement, and Sir Wm. Heygate was also bound by the same decree, and also by the agreement for the reference; so that the equity of the wife, being established, vests in her children, and their title is complete, and they are entitled to have one moiety of the fund settled upon them under the award, notwithstanding the death of their mother; but there must be a reference to the Master to inquire who are the children.

Holt produced an affidavit stating who were the children, which satisfied the Court without a reference; and the moiety of the fund was directed to be carried to the separate account of the children, with liberty to apply. One of the children, it appeared, was of unsound mind: the Court allowed his share to be paid to his father on his undertaking to account.

Common Law Courts.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

THOMAS v. HUDSON.

A commissioner of bankruptcy ought not to grant to a prisoner, in custody for damages in an action for assault and false imprisonment, an interim order of protection under the statutes 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116, and 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96; but such an order having been made, the gaoler in whose custody the prisoner is, is justified in obeying it, and is not liable for an action for an escape for discharging him in pursuance of the order.

Action on the case.

The declaration stated, that the plaintiff, having recovered judgment in this court against one Thomas Foulkes in an action for assault and false imprisonment, with 175*l.* 3s. 7d. damages and costs, sued out a fi. fa. under which he obtained only 5*l.* 5s.; and afterwards sued out a ca. sa. for the residue of his said damages and costs, under which ca. sa. Foulkes was taken by the Sheriff of Middlesex, and having afterwards, on the 8th of July, 1844, been brought up by habeas corpus, was regularly committed by the late Mr. Baron Gurney to the Queen's Bench prison, in execution for the residue of the sum of 150*l.* 3s. 7d. so recovered. There is then an averment in the declaration, that the defendant, being keeper of the said prison, received the said Foulkes and had him in custody on the said commitment, and afterwards wrongfully suffered him to escape.

Plea.—That Foulkes, after the said commitment in execution, on the 30th day of September, 1844, presented his petition to the Court of Bankruptcy praying relief under the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116, and 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, with a schedule of his debts annexed to the petition, such schedule including the sum due to the plaintiff; that, at the time of the presenting the said petition, Foulkes was not, nor ever had been, a trader, and that he was at the time a prisoner in execution on a judgment obtained by one Richard Croft for a debt of 1,200*l.*; that after the petition was presented, Joshua Evans, one of the commissioners of the Court of Bankruptcy, gave the petitioner an interim order of protection, and afterwards, and while Foulkes was in defendant's custody, namely, on the 1st of September, 1844, made an order on defendant to discharge Foulks, and Foulks was, in obedience to such order, discharged by the defendant. The plea then avers that the defendant had no notice of the nature of the plaintiff's action, save as it appeared from the habeas corpus, by which the sheriff stated that he had Foulkes in custody, under a writ of ca. sa., to satisfy the plaintiff of the sum of 14*l.* 6s. 6d., residue of 150*l.* 3s. 7d. damages in the said writ mentioned.

General demurrer.

The case was argued very fully during last term by Martin, Q. C. for the plaintiff, and Unthank for the defendant.

The Court took time to consider its judgment, which raises all the points, and states very fully all the material part of the argument. It was now delivered by Parke, B. as follows.

JUDGMENT.

The question raised for our decision is, whether the order of Mr. Commissioner Evans affords a good justification to the defendant for his discharge of Foulkes; and this depends upon the question, what powers were conferred on the commissioners by the recent statute of the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116, and the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96. Sec. 1, of the former statute, enacts that any person not being a trader, or being a trader, and not owing debts to the amount of 300*l.*, may, after giving certain notices, present a petition to the Court of Bankruptcy, praying for protection from process; and a schedule containing a full statement of his debts and assets of every description is to be annexed to the petition. On the presentation of such petition, the commissioner is empowered to give to the petitioner a protection from all processes either against his person or his property, until his appearance in court for examination at a certain day to be appointed for that purpose; and on such presentation of the petition all the property of the petitioner becomes vested in the official assignee. The order so given was in pursuance of certain rules framed under the authority of the Act, and is called an interim order, and is in force only until the petitioner appears for examination, but if the examination is not concluded at one sitting, it may be re-issued from time to time until the final examination, on the completion of which if the commissioner is satisfied of the truth of the allegations contained in the petition, and that no fraud has been practised by the petitioner, in contracting other debts, or any breach of trust committed, or any criminal prosecution, or without a reasonable prospect of being able to discharge them, or by reason of any judgment for breach of the revenue laws, or in certain enumerated actions of a criminal nature, including actions for an assault; and if he is also satisfied that the petitioner has not parted with any of his property since his petition, he may then give the petitioner a final order for protecting his person from all processes, and vesting his estate in assignees for the benefit of his creditors. By a subsequent statute, 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, s. 1, it is enacted that the petition may be presented without the notices originally required, and by the 6th section it is declared and enacted that every prisoner in execution on any judgment obtained in any action for the recovery of a debt, not being a trader, or being a trader, not owing debts under 300*l.* may be a petitioner for protection from processes, and every such petitioner to whom an interim order shall have been given, shall not only be protected from processes, but also from being detained in prison in execution on any judgment obtained in any action for the recovery of any debt mentioned in the schedule, and it shall be lawful for the commissioner to order any officer having any such petitioner in custody on any execution on any judgment to discharge him, and such officer shall not be liable to any action for any escape by reason of his so doing. These are the sections of the two acts on which the question before us mainly turns. It was argued for the plaintiff that it did not warrant the order of the commissioner, for that the only detainer in execution which the interim order of protection can reach is the detainer in execution on a judgment for a debt; whereas in the present case, the judgment is a judgment in an action of assault and false imprisonment. The defendant, on the other hand, contended that the order extends to all sums mentioned in the schedule of debts; or if not, that, at all events the defendant, the gaoler, was bound to obey the order whether warranted by the statute or not, it being an order made by a judge in a matter over which he had jurisdiction. With regard to the first point as to what are judgment debts, from a detention on account of which the legislature meant that the interim order should be a protection, there is certainly some difficulty. Supposing a petition to be presented under the first statute by a party not in custody, it is clear the interim order would, during its subsistence, have been a protection from all processes, not only in actions of debts, and on contract, but also in actions of tort; and it is equally clear that where a petitioner came before the commissioner for examination he would have been unable to obtain a final order under the 4th section unless he could satisfy the commissioner that his debts were not contracted (which must mean that none of his debts were contracted) by reason of any judgment in, amongst other actions, an action of assault, and as in this case one of his debts, namely, that which he owes to the plaintiff, arises from the damages recovered in an action of assault, it would have been the duty of the commissioner to refuse the final order, and the present plaintiff would have been entitled to execute a ca. sa., the interim order being no longer in force. The policy, therefore, of the Legislature in the first statute appears to have been to relieve the petitioner, in the first instance, from all apprehension of arrest immediately on his presenting a petition, and so giving up all his property; though at the same time, if, on a subsequent investigation of his affairs, it should turn out that any of his debts were of a nature leading to the inference that his conduct had been criminal or fraudulent, then he was no longer to be entitled to the protection. Such being the scheme of the first Act, the second Act, in the sixth section, extends to the right of petitioning for protection from process to any prisoner in execution upon any judgment obtained in any action for the recovery of any debt, and it proceeds to enact that the interim order shall not only protect the petitioner from process, but also from being detained in person, in execution upon any judgment obtained in any action for the recovery of any debt mentioned in his schedule, and the commissioner is authorized to order the gaoler to discharge him out of custody. The argument of the defendant was that the Legislature meant by this section to declare (for this clause is declaratory as well as enactive), and the circumstance of the petition not being his, should, in this respect, make no difference, and he would not have been temporarily protected from process if he had been at large, so he should be temporarily set at large if in confinement. Though this reasoning is not without its weight, yet, on the other hand, the words of the 4th section are very strong in favour of the plaintiff. The section enacts that that the interim order shall protect the petitioner from being detained in prison in execution upon any judgment obtained in any action for recovery of any debt mentioned in his schedule. Had this been the only part of the section in which these words had occurred, we might perhaps have been inclined to do some violence to the language, and to say that the provision applied to all sums due or judgments mentioned in the schedule as debts; but the same words, "action for the recovery of any debt," occur in the beginning of the clause; and we think in that first part of the clause they are certainly meant to apply exclusively to the judgment debts recovered in actions of debt; not perhaps confining their meaning to actions of debt, properly so called, but extending them also to judgments in actions on contracts for sums properly called debts, certainly, however, excluding the case of parties against whom judgments have been recovered in actions of debt. If this narrower construction be that which is to be adopted in the early part of the section, where the words are used for shewing to what class of judgment-debtors in execution the right of petitioning is given, it is very difficult to say that a different and wider sense is to be attributed to them in the subsequent sentence of the same section, where they are used to shew the debts against detention for which the interim order is to be a protection. The 7th, and 23rd and 24th sections of the second Act, to which we shall presently advert for another purpose, tends to confirm the construction contended for by the plaintiff; and on the whole, if it was necessary to decide the point, we should probably feel bound to say that the plaintiff was right, and that the judgment against Foulkes was not one which the statute intended the interim order to affect. It is not, however, absolutely necessary for us to come to any laborious decision on this point, inasmuch as we are clearly of opinion that on the second point the argument of the defendant is right, and that, whatever be the true construction of the Act, the defendant was bound to obey the order of the Commissioner as that of a judge acting in a matter over which he had jurisdiction. The argument of the plaintiff was, that although the court of the commissioner is now, for certain purposes, a court of record, yet that, in cases under the two statutes in question, he is acting, not as a single judge in discharge of his ordinary functions, but as a party exercising a special authority conferred on him by the Act of Parliament, and which authority, therefore, fails altogether, if attempted to be exercised in any case not directly within the terms of the statute conferring it. It is said the former is only to discharge the party petitioning from imprisonment on any such judgment, looking to the context, from a judgment obtained in an action for the recovery of a debt, and the commissioner, as to any judgment obtained in any other action than for the recovery of a debt, has no more power to order a prisoner's discharge than he would to order the discharge of a party who had not petitioned. This argument goes a great deal further than merely limiting the quality of the debts as to which the interim order shall be available. If good at all, it certainly shews that the order will be available only to any such petitioner,—that is, looking to the context, to a petitioner who either was not a trader, or who being a trader, did not owe so much as 300*l.*, and under the first Act who had given certain notices thereby required. Now, although the gaoler might perhaps be able to ascertain whether the petitioners are in custody on a judgment obtained in an action of debt or an action of tort, yet it would be obviously impossible for him to ascertain whether any prisoner in his custody, being a trader, owed debts exceeding 300*l.* The argument of the plaintiff must go the full length of contending that if a party in custody in execution on any judgment for a debt should present a petition, alleging that he was not a trader, or being a trader, that his debts were under 300*l.* and should obtain an interim order of protection, and an order for his discharge, the gaoler, if the allegations of the petition were true, would be bound to discharge him, if false, to detain him; and that, in the first case, if he did not discharge his prisoner he would be liable to an action for false imprisonment, and in the second, if he did discharge him, he would be liable to an action for escape. The course to be pursued by the gaoler is thus made to depend on the truth or falsehood of certain allegations, the truth or falsehood of which he has no means of ascertaining, so that without any default on his part, he may become liable to actions to any amount, and find himself ruined without the possibility of redress. This appears to me so nearly a reductio ad absurdum, that if there be any construction of the Act by which such a consequence may be avoided, we feel bound to adopt it. Mr. Martin contended that there was no such absurdity in the construction to which his reasoning necessarily led, and at all events, that if it be an absurdity, it is only an absurdity which the law tolerates in many analogous cases, and he referred to the case of messengers, assignees, and others acting under the commissioners of bankruptcy, all of whom act on the faith of the adjudication, and who, except in so far as modern statutes have protected them, are certainly responsible for all they do if it should turn out that the party was erroneously adjudged to be a bankrupt. There, however, appears to us to be a clear distinction between the two cases. In the cases suggested by Mr. Martin, the parties acting are all volunteers; they may act or not as they see fit, whereas, in the case before us, the defendant has no choice. The debtor is in his custody by the act of the law, and the gaoler is bound to keep him unless discharged by a competent authority. The law, therefore, which should impose on him the obligation of acting at his peril as to the facts, would be very different from that which applies to the ordinary case of bankruptcy; in the one case the party must act, in the other he may act or abstain from acting as he thinks fit. It only remains, therefore, to see whether the language of the statutes is such as to justify us in saying that the legislature meant, in a case like the present, to make the judgment of the commissioners conclusive. Now, construing the two Acts together, the petition, it is to be observed, must be accompanied on affidavit verifying its truth, and it must contain a statement that the petitioner is not a trader, or, if a trader, that his debts are under 300*l*. It must also contain a full account of his debts, stating their date and nature, and other particulars. This petition so verified being thus before the petitioner, the first section of the first statute enacts, that it shall be, thereupon, lawful for the commissioner to give an interim order of protection; and the second statute, if any such petition shall be in execution on any such judgment, it shall be lawful for the commissioner to order the gaoler to discharge him; the words are, "it shall be lawful for the commissioners, &c.," and we think this sufficiently shews that the commissioner is to act, not ministerially, but judicially; he is to come to a decision as to whether the petitioner, having complied with the requisites of the Act, shall or shall not have an interim order or an order of discharge—for to this he is, in such case, clearly entitled; but whether he has or has not done what the statute imposes as the condition on which he should become entitled to those privileges; if the petition should shew on the face of it that the petitioner was a trader, and it should appear by the schedule that his debts amounted to 300*l*. it would certainly be the duty of the commissioner to withhold the interim order; and if the petitioner, being in custody, should become entitled to his interim order, it would yet be the duty of the commissioner to withhold the order of discharge, in respect of any judgment, if such trade should not come within the description of a judgment obtained in any action for the recovery of any debt mentioned in the schedule. The commissioner, it is true, has but a very imperfect means of enabling him to come to a decision this matter; notwithstanding this, he has the petition and the affidavit, and on these he must exercise his judgment, and by that judgment all parties must be bound. The decision may be wrong, but it is a decision by a proper authority; and if wrong, it comes within the principle laid down in the marshalsea case. The strictness of this view of the statute seems to us to be strongly confirmed by some subsequent clauses. Section 7 enacts, that where any petitioner is a person in execution, and entitled to the discharge under section 6, the commissioner may by warrant, cause him to be brought up for examination. This shews that the commissioner is, on the facts before him, to decide whether the execution is or is not one in respect of which the petitioner is entitled to discharge. Again, after the examination the commissioner is, by sec. 23, to order the petitioner to be discharged from custody in respect of all debts to which the final order shall extend; that is, all debts whatever, except those which the commissioner shall decide to come within the exceptions contained in the 24th section. Now, here it is clear the commissioner was intended to exercise functions strictly judicial, and no one can doubt that his adjudication as to the final order is conclusive; and it appears to us, independently of all other considerations, to the last degree probable, that the legislature intended to give to one class of the commissioners' acts a character and effect different to that which is given to the others, to compel third persons to obey the final adjudication, and to protect them in the obedience to it, but in the meantime to leave them to act at their peril as to intermediate proceedings. The provisions referred to in the argument of the latter part of the 24th section, and hereby the commissioner is directed to remand to custody any person who, on examination, shall turn out to have have been erroneously discharged under section 6th, tends strongly to confirm us in the view we have taken of the statute. Upon these grounds, therefore, being strongly inclined to go along with the plaintiff in his first proposition, namely, that the deed was not one from which Foulkes ought to have been discharged by the commissioner, we yet think he has no right of action against the defendant, he having only obeyed the order of a judge in a matter over which he had jurisdiction, and our judgment must, therefore, be for the defendant.

Action of debt.

Declaration, for penalties upon the bye-laws of the Plumbers' Company. The declaration extended to a prodigious length.

JUDGMENT.

PARKE, B. now delivered judgment.—This case was argued in Easter Term last, before the Chief Baron, my brother Alderson, my brother Rolfe, and myself. The questions arose upon a demurrer to a declaration in debt, upon the bye-laws of the Plumbers' Company. The bye-laws provide that the master and wardens, &c. may call, choose, elect, and admit into the livery or clothing of the company, such person, free of the art or mystery of plumbing, as they should think fit, meet, and able; and every person so called shall, immediately upon notice thereof given by the said masters and wardens, or any of them, or by their beadle or other officer for the time being, prepare himself to serve the same place, at the then next meeting of the said master and wardens, in such seemly and decent manner, and in such sort, as formerly by such persons at that place and sort has been used; and moreover, that every person is called and chosen into the same livery and clothing, and accepting the same on him, shall so wear and keep the said clothing according to the usage or custom amongst the same fellowship used, and also according unto warning or summons given unto him from the master and wardens for the time being, for that purpose; and further also, the same person and persons so called and chosen into the said livery and clothing as aforesaid, and accepting the same, shall severally bring in and pay to the said next meeting unto the said master and wardens, for the time being, to the use, maintenance, and relief of the Company of the said art or mystery, and to the officers of the said company for entering the same into their books of remembrance, and for the warning given, such fees and duties as formerly by the said company or fellowship hath been paid in the cases; and which of them soever so called or chosen into the same livery or clothing, refuseth to pay the said fees or duties, or any of them, or what person or persons called and chosen to be of or in the same livery or clothing and refuses the same, shall forfeit and pay to the same master and wardens for the time being, for every such default, to such uses as aforesaid, the sum of five pounds of lawful money of England, or less, at the pleasure and discretion of the said master and wardens for the time being, so to be not under forty shillings. And the declaration avers, that the defendant was a freeman of the art or mystery of the company, but not of the city of London, and was duly elected; and assigns, as a breach of the bye-laws, that, although the defendant was, and continued such freeman as aforesaid, he did not, and would not, prepare himself to serve the said place to which he had been so duly called, chosen, and elected in manner and form aforesaid, and did not and would not attend to serve the place as aforesaid, at the then next meeting, to wit, at the time and place in that behalf aforesaid, or at any subsequent meeting of the said master and wardens; and the defendant therein made default, and then wholly neglected and refused, and hath always hitherto neglected and refused to prepare himself to serve the same place at which he was so duly called, chosen, and elected, in manner, and form aforesaid. The declaration then states, that the defendant was adjudged to be fined five pounds, the master and wardens having declared it to be their will and pleasure that that sum should be paid, and then states the non-payment by the defendant. On the part of the defendant several objections were taken. First, that the bye-laws were bad, because it did not appear that the Plumbers' Company was a company that had a livery; secondly, that it was bad because the penalty was not certain but arbitrary; thirdly, that the defendant was not admissible into the livery, because none but freemen of the city were admissible, and there was no averment that the defendant was a freeman of the city; fourthly, that the breach was defectively assigned, inasmuch as there was no proper averment that the defendant had refused, so as to be liable to the penalty. We think that none of these objections ought to prevail. The first was grounded on the authority of the case of the Innholders' Company (Sayer v. Godhill, 274), in which the Court of Queen's Bench held that as it was not alleged that the Company had a livery, the Court could not intend it. For the plaintiff it was said that this case was overruled in that of the Vintners' Company v. Passey (1 Lord Kenyon's Reports, 500; 1 Burrough's, 235). But this statement is not correct. The point was mentioned in that case by the defendant's counsel, and that of the Innholders' Company was cited. But the defendant's own plea admitted the fact that the company was entitled to a livery, and therefore he could not take any objection. But we think that the present case is distinguishable, because, by the charter set out in the declaration, the King evidently contemplated that there should be a livery of the company, and for some person or persons wearing it, because he directs that the persons of the livery of the company should have a voice in the election of wardens; and we cannot construe a bye-law to be unreasonable, and illegal, and void, which is to carry into effect the charter and secure the completion of the body which the crown intends to exist. The second objection was, that the penalty was arbitrary, and whereas it ought to be certain, not varying at the will and pleasure of the persons who were to receive it. The only case which we have been able to find bearing upon this question is that cited in the argument for the plaintiff, namely, Wood v. Searls (Bridg. 139), in which the penalty was such sum as the master and wardens, &c. should assess, not exceeding forty shillings. But this case is no authority either way, for the bye-law was held to be bad, and it might have been held so upon other objections as upon this. In the absence of any authority to the contrary, we do not see any objection to this mode of fixing the penalty. It is a certain penalty of five pounds, with the power of mitigation not below two pounds, and we do not think this is unreasonable. We therefore think the second objection ought not to prevail. The third is, that there is no averment that the defendant was a freeman of the city; and it is said to be recognized law, that no one can be admitted to the livery of the company who is not free of the city. It has been held that the Court of Queen's Bench will take notice of the nature of a liveryman's office, and Mr. Justice Denison appears to have acted on that authority in the case in Sayers, 275, in giving his opinion that the declaration ought to have contained the averment that the defendant was a freeman of the city. In the case of The Wardens of the Company of Leather Sellers v. Beacon (Sir Thomas Jones's Reports, 149), the custom of the city was pleaded that one must be a freeman of the city to be admitted to the livery of the company, and the traverse of the custom concluded with a verification; and rightly, because the Court said the custom must be proved by the recorder, ore tenus; and it is not improbable that between the date of that case 33 Charles 2, and in which the Court did not take notice of the custom; and that in Salkeld, 8 Wm. 3, in which it did, the custom was so certified in the King's Bench, and when once there has been a certificate by the recorder to the Court, that Court always afterwards takes notice of the custom. (Lord Mansfield, Blagmore v. Hawkins, Douglas, 384). But there is no authority that one court can take notice of such a record in another. The Court of Common Pleas, it is true, having heard the admission of the custom from the counsel on both sides, adopted it obiter; but it did not in any way affect the propriety of the judgment, which was quite correct, whether such was the case or not. (Poulterer's Company v. Philips, 6 Burroughs, 321.) This case, therefore, is no authority upon this point. We think, therefore, this objection ought not to prevail. First, because we are not called upon to presume that the livery mentioned in the charter, is a livery entitling to vote in any city election with its incidents; it is enough that it is primâ facie legal for some purposes: and secondly, because, if this livery means a city livery, this Court cannot take notice of the custom of the city with respect to the livery; for it does not appear that it has ever been certified to this Court in the mode in which the city charter directs that it should, namely, ore tenus by the Recorder. The last objection is, as to the form of the breach. We are satisfied a refusal to which the penalty is attached, is the refusal to prepare to serve, and to serve at the next court; and consequently, the breach is well assigned; therefore out judgment must be for the plaintiff.

COMMISSIONERS' COURTS.

Wednesday, August 20.
(Before Mr. Commissioner HOLROYD.)
Re CHAMBERS, the elder, and CHAMBERS, the younger, Bankrupts.
Joint estate.

Where two partners carried on business as bankers, and certain properties had been purchased with the moneys of the firm in the name of one only of the partners, but which property had been dealt with by the firm as the joint property of the partnership, Held, that such partner was only a trustee for the firm with respect to such property, and that the property was divisible under the bankruptcy amongst the joint creditors.

Held, also, that such trust need not be created by writing, but might be proved from subsequent writings, or might arise from the evident intention of the parties.*

Held, also, that freehold property may be considered in bankruptcy as partnership property, and treated as a chattel interest between partners.*

JUDGMENT.

In this case a question arises, whether certain property which has come to the assignees of the bankrupts is to be administered under the bankruptcy as the joint estate of the two bankrupts, or as the separate estate of A. H. Chambers, the elder.

Swanston, Q. C. and Amphlett argued the case on the part of the assignees for the creditors on the joint estate.

Russell, Q. C. supported the claim on behalf of the creditors on the separate estate of A. H. Chambers, the elder.

There are four different properties upon which the question arises:—

1. The Queen's Theatre, or Opera House.
2. Chettle Estate.
3. Windsor Estate.
4. Northam Estate.

On the part of the joint creditors, it was contended that the property in question had been obtained by investments of moneys of the firm, and of previous partnerships in the house, and that the whole had been dealt with and treated as partnership property by the bankrupts; that the annual balance-sheets shewed the property to be the assets of the partnership; and the cases of Ex parte Hunter (2 Rose, 382) and Ex parte Muston (1 M. D. & G. 261, per Sir G. Rose) were cited.

On the part of the separate creditors, it was urged that the principle in the cases cited did not apply to the present case; that the property in question was real estate, and the ownership in Chambers, the elder, and that nothing had been done which would have the effect of converting it into joint estate; that the Opera House had been claimed by the assignees, as assignees of Chambers, the elder; and that by the result of the suit establishing the title of the assignees, it must be administered as the separate estate of Chambers, the elder. It was further contended, that the sums set against the different estates in the annual balance-sheets never became joint estates; but that if the sums so set down were to be deemed joint estate, the property did not necessarily become so; that it would be upsetting the provisions of the Statute of Frauds; and that, under any circumstances, the assignees of the joint estate could only claim as mortgagees. Upon the statement submitted to me, on behalf of both the joint and separate creditors, I am clearly of opinion that the property in question must be administered in bankruptcy as the joint estate of Chambers and Son. There are many authorities that freehold estate may be considered partnership property (Thornton v. Dixon, 3 Bro. C. C. 199; Smith v. Smith, 5 Ves. jun. 189; Bateman v. Shore, 9 Ves. jun. 500), and treated as a chattel interest between partners. (Bell v. Phyna, 7 Ves. jun. 453.) Looking, then, to the provisions in the articles of partnership of Chambers and Son, and to the annual accounts made out in pursuance thereof, together with the entries in the Bank books relating to the money and property in question, and the circumstances mentioned in the statement with regard to the prior partnerships, and the mode of dealing with the property, I think sufficient evidence is adduced of a trust for the partnership, and that the several properties in question are liable to be charged, for the benefit of the joint creditors, to the amount of the sums which appear to have been advanced for or on account of these different estates. It is not necessary that a trust should be created by writing, it may be manifested and proved by writing shewing that there was such a trust; and a trust may also arise from the evident intention of the parties; and in either way, the case would be taken out of the Statute of Frauds. For what purpose were accounts kept in the partnership books with the properties in question, and why were those properties entered in the annual accounts, shewing the state of the partnership, unless they were considered by the parties as partnership property to the extent charged against them? Then as to the point urged by Mr. Russell, that to make the Opera House joint estate would be interfering with the decree of the House of Lords, I think that was satisfactorily answered by Mr. Swanston. The dispute there was between Chambers and Waters; it was necessary to establish the right of Chambers the elder, to found the equitable right of the assignees of the joint estate.

Re JUSTIN.

Costs.

Where an insolvent has made a proposal for payment of his debts by instalments, which was agreed to by his creditors, but no creditors' assignee was appointed, the Court will allow a creditor who resides out of town, out of the insolvent's estate, his travelling expenses of coming up to London to ascertain whether the instalments are regularly paid.

Where no creditors' assignee had been appointed under the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116, by the commissioner, according to the provisions of that Act before the passing of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, the commissioner has no power now to appoint, but such assignee must be chosen by the creditors at a meeting called for that purpose.

This insolvent had presented his petition under the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116. The petition contained a proposal for payment of the insolvent's debts by instalments, which proposal had been accepted by the creditors, and the granting of the final order was adjourned, upon the understanding that if the insolvent paid the instalments as they became due, he was to have his protection continued from time to time, but otherwise, it was not to be renewed. No creditors' assignee having been appointed, one of the creditors, who lived a short distance from London, came to London as the instalments became payable, to see if they were paid, and he now applied to the Court either to be himself appointed by the Court creditors' assignee, under the power contained in the 5 & 6 Vict. for that purpose, in which case he would be entitled to his expenses, or else, as his attendance in London was for the benefit of all the creditors, that his expenses might be allowed him without being appointed assignee.

His HONOUR.—As no appointment of creditors' assignee took place under the 5 & 6 Vict. previous to the passing of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, which took the appointment out of the hands of the commissioner and placed it in the hands of the creditors, I have no power now to appoint. The appointment, if made, must be under the latter Act; but I should think it would hardly be worth while to incur the expense in this case of calling a meeting for the choice of an assignee. I will allow, in this case, the creditor's travelling expenses.

SMALL v. FRENCH.

Where a defendant had obtained a final order for protection in this court, but had omitted to insert the plaintiff, who was the indorsee of a promissory note made by the defendant, as a creditor in his schedule, such order will not protect the defendant from having an order made upon him for payment, under the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 127.

This was a summons under the recent Act for the recovery of small debts.

The plaintiff was indorsee, and the defendant maker, of a promissory note for 12*l*. 6*s*. Subsequently to the indorsement of the note to the plaintiff, and after it became due, the defendant presented a petition to this Court for protection from process, and obtained his final order thereon. The plaintiff had not any notice of the filing of the petition of the insolvent, his name was not inserted in the schedule of the defendant filed in this court with the petition as a creditor. The plaintiff had since brought an action against the defendant upon the note, and had obtained a judgment against him by default. The judgment having been proved, and the defendant, who stated himself to be a notary public, having been examined as to his ability to pay,

His HONOUR said, There is nothing in this case to prevent an order being made. The defendant must pay 1*l*. per month.

(Before Mr. Commissioner FAST.)

Re SMITH, a Trader.

Where a petition had been presented to this Court by a debtor under the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 70, and a meeting of creditors convened by the commissioner, but at such meeting the creditors refused to assent to the proposal of the petitioning debtor, this Court will not, upon a second petition being filed, direct another meeting of creditors to be convened.

This was an application to a commissioner of this Court, under the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 70, "An Act for facilitating Arrangements between Debtors and Creditors," to direct a meeting of the creditors of the petitioning debtor to be convened, for the purpose of taking into consideration the proposal of such debtor, set forth in his petition, for payment of his debts. The petition was signed by more than one-third (the number required by the Act) of the creditors of the debtor.

This was a second petition by this debtor. On the former petition a meeting of creditors had been convened by the direction of the commissioner, but at such meeting of creditors it was discovered that the debtor had not inserted in his petition all his creditors, as required by the Act. No further proceeding consequently took place under that petition. The debtor had since been sued by one of his creditors, who had recovered a judgment against him.

The COMMISSIONER.—I do not think I can proceed upon a second petition under this Act. A meeting of creditors was convened under the first petition, and the creditors refused their assent to the debtor's proposal. I have no right to harass the creditors by convening another meeting. The debtor should have inserted all his creditors in his first petition.

Application refused.

RICHARDSON v. WARD.

Summons of debtor under 8 & 9 Vict. c. 127.

A commissioner has no jurisdiction where the judgment recovered is in form above 20l. unless it be shewn to his satisfaction that it was, in fact, for no greater sums.

This was an application for a summons under the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 127.

The plaintiff in this case had brought an action of debt in the Court of Common Pleas against the defendant for 15*l*. 1*s*. and had obtained a judgment against him by default. To prove the judgment, an office copy of the judgment-roll was put in. The judgment-roll was in the usual form; it contained a copy of the declaration; then followed an allegation that the defendant had said nothing in bar of the said action, and it concluded, "Therefore it is considered that the plaintiff do recover against the defendant his debt aforesaid." The sum demanded in the commencement of the declaration, and to which these words refer, was, as is usual, the aggregate of the sums mentioned in the different counts of the declaration, and amounted in this case to 60*l*.

His HONOUR.—Before I grant a summons under this Act, I must be satisfied by legal evidence that a judgment has been recovered in a court of competent jurisdiction, according to the terms of the Act, and that the judgment is for a sum not more than 20l. exclusive of costs. In this case the judgment is a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, which I am bound to take notice of as a court of competent jurisdiction, but the judgment, upon the face of it, appears to be for 60*l*. If that is the case, I have no jurisdiction under this Act. But if you mean to say that it is the practice of the superior courts to sign judgment for a larger sum than the debt sought to be recovered, I must have an affidavit of that fact, and of the real amount of the debt recovered, and of the costs, either from the plaintiff or his attorney, or I must be satisfied by other legal evidence of such facts, before I can grant the summons you ask for.

Summons refused.

BRISTOL DISTRICT BANKRUPTCY COURT.

(Before Mr. Commissioner Serjeant STEPHEN.)

Thursday, August 28.

DENISON v. HAWKES.

The production of the judgment paper and roll containing merely the incipitur, but bearing the seal of the Court, and the writ of execution for the debt also sealed, is sufficient proof of the judgment under 8 & 9 Vict. c. 127.

The Court will not make an order for payment by instalments or otherwise in the absence of the debtor. The Court has merely a power of committal on the non appearance of the debtor.

T. G. Philpotts, attorney for the plaintiff, produced the incipitur of the judgment-roll, the judgment-paper (merely containing the incipitur), and a writ of execution in this case, all under the seal of the Court of Queen's Bench, and submitted that they were sufficient evidence of a judgment to give jurisdiction to the Court to proceed under 8 & 9 Vict. c. 127.

His HONOUR (after having his attention called to the case of Jones v. Keen, p. 432, ante), said he would construe the Act liberally, and receive the evidence as sufficient to satisfy him of the existence of the judgment.

The defendant did not appear, but a clerk of Philpotts' produced an affidavit of service of the summons, and a letter from Phelps, the defendant's attorney, which had been given to him by the defendant himself. The letter stated that defendant would consent to an order for the payment of 1*l*. per month.

Philpotts requested the Court to make such an order.

His HONOUR.—I have no power to make the order in the absence of the defendant. The clause runs, "in case such debtor shall not attend as required by the said summons," &c. "it shall be lawful for such commissioner, or the judge of such court, to order such debtor to be committed." The power to order payment by instalments or otherwise can only be exercised in the presence of the debtor, and the Court has merely a power of committal, on the non-appearance of the debtor.

JONES v. WILLIAMS.

If the judgment-debtor does not appear, and there is no affidavit of service produced, the summons will be dismissed.

In this case the defendant did not appear, and the plaintiff was called upon to prove the service of the summons. He admitted that he could not do so, and had no affidavit of service.

His HONOUR.—The summons must be dismissed.

Re CROUCH.

One who trades on account of and for the benefit of another is a trader himself within the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96.

The omission of the words, " but owing debts amounting in the whole to less than 300l." in a trader's petition is fatal.

An insolvent's petition cannot be amended.

This insolvent came up on his interim order, when Brooke Smith opposed, on the ground that the insolvent was described in his petition as a trader, but the words " but owing debts amounting in the whole to less than 300l." were omitted.

Bevan, attorney for the insolvent.—The insolvent is not a general trader, but only a limited one, selling and not buying, and that not on his own account; he does not, therefore, come within the direction of the form required by the statute. He is described in his petition as "conducting his business as a trader in Host-street in his own name, but on account, and under the authority of Joseph Crouch, his employer." This is not a trading on his own account within the description of the Act of Parliament.

His Honour.—The insolvent's former petition was dismissed because he appeared to be a trader, and was not described as such. This Court considers the man who trades for the benefit of another party is a trader himself; to hold otherwise would be a contradiction in terms. The whole of this branch of the law has reference to the interest of other parties. He is a trader to the public, and, except from his own account, I do not know that he does not trade for his own benefit. The petition is not in the form required by the Act of Parliament, and must be dismissed.

Bevan asked leave to amend the petition.

His Honour.—There is no power to amend petitions, nor was it intended that the petition should be amended. The petition and schedule are two different things, and the power of amendment only applies to the latter. Petition dismissed.

NEWCASTLE-UPON-TYNE DISTRICT BANKRUPTCY COURT.

Wednesday, August 27.

(Before Mr. Commissioner Ellison.)

Re Inwood.

Evidence of the amount of debt recovered will not be received contradictory to the judgment.

Chater, attorney for the summoning creditor, produced an office copy of a judgment in the Queen's Bench, by which it appeared that the defendant had suffered judgment by default in an action of debt. The damages in the declaration had been laid at the nominal sum of 300l. and the judgment entered up (as is very usual) for the full amount of the damages so laid in the declaration. Chater proposed to prove, by production of the writ of summons in the action and evidence of the amount of the plaintiff's particulars of demand, that the sum actually recovered in the action was only 18l. and so bring the matter within the jurisdiction of the Court.

Cowper, the defendant's attorney, contended that the Court could not receive the extrinsic evidence proposed to be adduced, and that the office-copy judgment was required to be produced by the Act for two purposes only; first, to shew that a judgment had been recovered; and, secondly, to shew the amount recovered thereby; and as it appeared on the face of the office-copy judgment produced that the debt recovered was upwards of 20l. the recent Small Debts Act did not apply.

His Honour was of opinion that he could not receive evidence which in effect falsified the judgment.

Summons dismissed.

LIVERPOOL SUMMER ASSIZES, 1845.

Wednesday, August 20.

(Before Mr. Baron Rolfe.)

Reg. v. James William Ferguson.

Forgery—Warrant for payment of money—11 Geo. 4 and 1 Wm. 4, c. 66, s. 3.

Any document requesting the payment of money, which, if genuine, would give to the person paying the money in pursuance of it a right of action against the writer, is, if forged, a forged warrant for the payment of money within the meaning of the above statute.

Forgery.

The first count of the indictment charged that the prisoner forged a certain " warrant for the payment of money, to wit, 20l." with intent to defraud one Joseph Roberts.

The second count charged the forging of a certain " order for the payment of money, to wit, 20l. " with the like intent.

The third count charged the uttering of a forged warrant for the payment of money, describing it as in the first count, and with the like intent.

The fourth count charged the uttering of a forged order describing it as in the second count, with the like intent.

The instrument was not set forth in any of the counts.

The following is a copy of it:—

" Sir,—You will please to comply with my wish, if possible, in sending a messenger with the bearer of this note; he is acting paymaster, but waiting for his commission; he is the total dependence whom the contract depends on. I want of you 20l. in change. 10l. in gold, 5l. in silver, and 5l. in copper; and I shall send you four 5l. notes Bank of England.

" Thomas Paisley,

" Quartermaster-sergeant."

It appeared in evidence that Mr. Joseph Roberts was a flour-dealer at Manchester, who, under contract, supplied bread to the troops at the infantry barracks there. On the night of Saturday, the 3rd of May, the prisoner presented to him the letter of which the above is a copy; that Mr. Roberts had on many occasions lent sums of money to the quartermaster-serjeants of the different regiments stationed in the barracks, but had never lent money to Thomas Paisley, the quartermaster-sergeant of the regiment in barracks on the 3rd of May, that regiment having only been stationed there about a week. He refused to lend the money, but did so only because he suspected from the terms of the letter that it was not a genuine one.

It was also proved that the quartermaster-sergeant frequently paid small accounts for the quartermaster, whose duty it was to discharge them.

The letter was proved to be a forgery.

The learned judge having expressed a doubt whether the instrument was either a " warrant " or an " order " for the payment of money within the meaning of the 11 Geo. 4 & 1 Wm. 4 c. 66, s. 3,

Monk, for the prosecution.—The question is, whether this document is not properly described as a warrant for the payment of money. A warrant for the payment of money is a written authority from the party signing it to the party to whom it is addressed to pay the amount mentioned on it, and this document is such an authority. It is not necessary that the person to whom it is addressed should be under any legal obligation to pay. In this case Mr. Roberts had been in the habit of accommodating the quartermaster serjeants of the regiments, for the time being, in those barracks with money, and this document purported to authorise the payment of the money on the credit of the Quartermaster Serjeant Thomas Paisley. Mr. Roberts refused to send this money, but that was only because he suspected it was not genuine. Had the order been a genuine one, and the money paid, Thomas Paisley would have become liable upon it to Mr. Roberts for the amount advanced. He cited Reg. v. Raake (2 Moo. C. C. 66, 8 Car. & P. 627); Reg. v. Rogers (9 Car. & P. 41); Reg. v. Vivian (1 Car. & Ker, 719).

Rolfe, B. having cited from his note-book in MS. the case of Reg. v. Thomas Carter, argued in Serjeants-inn Hall on the 14th of February last, reported 1 Cox, C. C. 170.—I think if this be a request to Roberts to pay 20l. to bearer on writer's account, it is a warrant for the payment of money. The test is, if this were a genuine letter, and the money had been paid to the bearer, would Roberts have a right of action against Paisley the writer? I think he would. Roberts had been in the habit of lending money to quartermaster-serjeants of regiments in those barracks who were in the habit of making payments for the quartermasters. This regiment had then recently come, and Roberts had never advanced money to this quartermaster-sergeant; but if the meaning of this document be that Roberts was to send that money by the bearer on Paisley's credit and account, it is, I think, a warrant within the meaning of the statute.

The prisoner was convicted.

On the following morning his lordship stated, that on looking again at the document, he thought that it did not authorise the payment of the money to the bearer, but only desired that a messenger of Robert's might be sent with it. He should, therefore, communicate with the Secretary of State. The principle was, as he had stated it yesterday, but the document did not come within it.

QUEEN'S BENCH, 1845.

January 22 and 25, April 29, and May 2 and 8.

Edmond Conway and Patrick Lynch in Error v. The Queen.

In a capital case, in the absence of any fatality or evident necessity, a judge has no discretionary power of discharging a jury without their giving a verdict, because, after a long deliberation, they state that they cannot agree.(a)

It is no sufficient reason, per se, for their discharge, that, in the judge's opinion, more than a reasonable and sufficient time has elapsed to enable them, if they could at all, to agree.

Where a judge discharges a jury in such case without their giving a verdict, the reasons which have induced him to consider it necessary so to do should be set out upon the record, in order to their being reviewed, if necessary, by a superior court.

The prisoners were tried before Jackson, J. at the county of Limerick Spring Assizes, on the 4th of March, 1843, upon an indictment charging them with the murder of the Rev. Charles Dawson. The jury, after having been locked up for a considerable time without being able to agree upon a verdict, and having informed the learned judge that they could not agree upon a verdict, were at length discharged, and the prisoners detained in custody.

Upon the 10th of October in the same year, at the adjourned Summer Assizes for the same county, the prisoners were again tried for the same offence, and the jury having on this occasion also been unable to agree, were, after having been confined for a considerable number of hours, this being the last case to be tried upon the circuit, discharged by Jackson, J. who presided, and the prisoners were remanded.

At the ensuing Spring Assizes in March 1844, the prisoners having been again placed upon their trial, they each pleaded to the indictment the two following pleas:—

" And afterwards, to wit, on the 2nd day of March, in the year of our Lord 1844, to wit, at Limerick aforesaid, in the county of the city of Limerick aforesaid, before the Right Hon. Maziere Brady, Chief Baron of her Majesty's Court of Exchequer in Ireland, and the Hon. Joseph Devonsher Jackson, one of her Majesty's Justices of the Court of Common Pleas in Ireland, being the justices of our said lady the Queen duly assigned to hold the assizes in and for the said county of Limerick, comes the Right Hon. Thomas Berry Cusack Smith, her Majesty's Attorney-General, to prosecute for and on behalf of our said lady the Queen; and the said Edmond Conway, (b) also, then and there, comes in his own proper person, and the said Edmond Conway says that our said lady the Queen ought not further to prosecute the above-mentioned indictment against him, the said Edmond Conway, because he says that heretofore, to wit, on the 2nd day of March, in the year of our Lord 1843, at Limerick aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, at an assizes then and there holden, in and for the said county of Limerick, before the Right Hon. Nicholas Ball, one of the justices, &c. and the said Joseph Devonsher Jackson, one other of her Majesty's justices, &c. being then and there the justices duly assigned to hold the assizes in and for the said county of Limerick, the jurors of the jury whereof mention is within made, being then and there called, did then and there come, and thereupon (setting out the names of the jury) twelve of the jurors last aforesaid were then and there duly called, and did then and there answer to their names respectively, and were then and there duly sworn and empannelled to try the said issue above, to wit, between our said sovereign lady the Queen and the said Edmond Conway, as above mentioned; and the said last-mentioned jurors so sworn and empannelled as last aforesaid were then and there duly charged with the said Edmond Conway, who was then and there duly given in charge to the said last-mentioned jurors so sworn and empannelled as aforesaid, and the said Right Hon. Thomas Berry Cusack Smith, Attorney-General, as aforesaid, on behalf our said lady the Queen, did then and there produce divers, to wit, ten witnesses, for and on behalf of our said lady the Queen, who were then and there duly sworn, and who then and there gave evidence to the said Court and to the said jury so sworn and empannelled, and charged with the said Edmond Conway, touching the said supposed felony of murder aforesaid. And the said Edmond Conway further says, that the said jurors so sworn and empannelled as last aforesaid, were then and there, and after they were so charged with the said Edmond Conway, as last aforesaid, discharged of him, the said Edmond Conway, not by reason of any fatality of him, the said Edmond Conway, or for or by reason of any fatality of them, the said jurors, so sworn and empannelled as last aforesaid, or any of them, or for or by reason of any other sufficient or legal cause whatsoever; and this he, the said Edmond Conway, is ready to verify; wherefore he prays judgment; and that he may be dismissed by the Court here from the premises in the said indictment above mentioned, and that the same may not be further prosecuted against him, the said Edmond Conway.

" And thereupon, the said Edmond Conway again says, that our said lady the Queen ought not further to prosecute the said indictment against him, the said Edmond Conway, because he says that, heretofore, to wit, on the 10th day of October, in the year of our Lord 1843, to wit, at Limerick, in the county of Limerick, at an adjourned assizes," &c.

The plea here sets out the trial of the prisoner on the 10th of October as in the first plea, the only difference being that the names of the witnesses for the prosecution on the latter trial are given, and then proceeds as follows:—

" And the said Edmond Conway says that the jurors last aforesaid, so sworn and empannelled as aforesaid, and after they were so charged with the said Edmond Conway as aforesaid, and after they had heard the evidence as aforesaid, were then and there discharged of him, the said Edmond Conway,

(a) Crampton, J. dissentient.

(b) The pleas and replications and subsequent proceedings in Lynch's case were precisely the same as those put in in Conway's case.

not by reason of any fatality of him, the said Edmond Conway, or for or by reason of any fatality of or to them, the said jurors, so sworn and empannelled as aforesaid, or of any of them, or for or by reason of any accident to, or infirmity or illness of, them the said jurors sworn and empannelled as aforesaid, or any of them, or for or by reason of any other sufficient or legal cause whatsoever, and this the said Edmond Conway ready to verify; wherefore he prays judgment, and that he may be dismissed by the Court here from the premises in the said indictment mentioned; and that the same may not be further prosecuted against him, the said Edmond Conway."

To these pleas the following replications were put in:—

"And the Right Honourable Thomas Berry Cusack Smith, the Attorney-General of our said lady the Queen, &c. comes, and protesting, &c. nevertheless, to the said plea, he, the said Attorney-General, &c. &c. says that our said lady the Queen ought not to be barred from further prosecuting the said indictment, nor ought the said Edmond Conway to be discharged or go without a day, for or by reason of any thing in said plea alleged, because he, the said Attorney-General, &c. says, that at and after the said time of the said swearing and empannelling of the said jurors in the said plea mentioned and named, and at and after the said time of the giving in charge of the said Edmond Conway, to wit, on the day and year in said plea mentioned, at the assizes in the said plea mentioned, divers, to wit, thirteen witnesses; that is to say (here their names were set out), then and there, in the presence of the said justices, and of the said jurors, and of the said Edmond Conway, in open court, were duly sworn upon their oaths respectively, true evidence to give between our said lady the Queen and the said Edmond Conway, touching and concerning the felony and matters in the said indictment contained; and the said several witnesses being so sworn, were then and there examined, and gave evidence upon their oaths respectively, in the presence and hearing of the said justices and of the said jurors and of the said Edmond Conway, in said open court, then and there being at the assizes aforesaid, in said plea mentioned, and said several witnesses then and there gave evidence, upon their oaths respectively, for and on behalf of our said lady the Queen, in said open court, in the presence and hearing of the said justices and of the said jurors in said plea mentioned, and in the presence and hearing of the said Edmond Conway, then and there in said open court being present, touching and cf and concerning the said felony in the said indictment mentioned."

The replication then, after stating, in similar manner, the production and examination of divers witnesses on behalf of the prisoner, and that they were the only witnesses tendered on behalf of the prisoner, went on to say:—

"That all the evidence then and there, or at any time, produced or tendered or offered by or on the part or behalf of the said Edmond Conway, &c. was duly heard and received by the said justices, then and there presiding, &c. and by the said jurors; and was by the said justices afterwards then and there duly left and submitted to the consideration of the said jurors; and that the said Edmond Conway then and there declared, in the said open court, in the presence of the said justices and of the said jurors so empannelled as aforesaid, that he, the said Edmond Conway, had not any further or other evidence to offer or produce to or before the said Court, or the said justices, or the said jurors, touching, or of or concerning said felony and matters in said indictment, or any of them.

"And the said Attorney-General, &c. further saith, that after all the said several witnesses, being so as aforesaid duly sworn and examined in said open court, had then and there given their evidence as aforesaid, and in the presence of the said justices and of the said jurors so empannelled as aforesaid, and in the presence of the said Edmond Conway, and after the said Edmond Conway had so as aforesaid declared that he had not any further or other evidence to produce or offer to or before the said Court, or the said justices, or the said jurors, to wit, on the same day and year in said plea mentioned, the said jurors being so charged, and having heard the said evidence, were then and there, in the presence and hearing of the said Edmond Conway, duly charged by the said justices, then and there presiding in the said open court, touching and concerning the felony and matters in the indictment aforesaid mentioned, and the issue joined thereon between our said lady the Queen and the said Edmond Conway; and afterwards the said jurors then and there, by the directions of the said justices, retired from the said public court into their private jury-room, adjoining the said public court, for the purpose of considering and deliberating in private upon their said verdict; and the said Attorney-General further saith, that the said jurors then and there, and from thenceforth, remained and continued in their said private jury-room, and without meat, drink, or fire, or other refreshment being had or received by the said jurors or any of them, for a long space of time, to wit, for twenty-four hours, thence next ensuing; and that afterwards, and after the said jurors had so retired, and after the lapse of much more than a sufficient and reasonable time for enabling the said jurors to consider and fully deliberate upon their verdict touching the said felony and matters in the said indictment mentioned, and to agree upon their verdict in case they could have at all agreed together touching or respecting the same, to wit, after twenty-four hours had elapsed from the time of their so retiring from the said public court into their said private jury-room as aforesaid, to wit, on the 3rd day of March, in the said year of our Lord 1813, being the day next after the said day on which the said Edmond Conway was so given in charge to the said jurors as in said plea mentioned, the said jurors then and there came from their said private jury-room into said open court, and then and there, in said open court, at said assizes, there declared, to and before and in the presence and hearing of the said justices, and in the presence and hearing of the said Edmond Conway, then and there being present in said open court, that they, the said jurors, had not agreed upon their verdict, and that they, the said jurors, could not agree together upon any verdict upon or touching or concerning the said indictment or issue, or any of the matters therein contained; and that they, the said jurors, had not agreed together, nor found, and could not agree together or find, or say, upon their oaths whether or not the said Edmond Conway was guilty of the said felony, or matters in the said indictment mentioned, or any of them.

And the said Attorney-General further saith, that afterwards, and after the lapse of the said time, being more than a reasonable time as aforesaid for the said jurors, considering and deliberating upon their said verdict, and after the said jurors had so declared to the said justices, in open court at said assizes, and the presence of the said Edmond Conway as aforesaid, that they, the said jurors, had not agreed to their verdict, and that they could not agree together upon any verdict on the said indictment, the said justices then and there presiding at the said trial at said assizes, then and there, without any objection being made by or on behalf of the said Edmond Conway to the discharge of the said jurors, of their the said justices' own authority, and in the exercise of the discretionary power and authority by law in them the said justices vested, in that behalf, and without the consent of our said lady the Queen, or of the said Attorney-General, or of any other person on behalf of our said lady the Queen, in that behalf released and discharged them, the said jurors, from finding any verdict on said indictment, and then and there allowed the said jurors to separate and go at large as they lawfully might for the cause aforesaid, and thereupon the said jurors then and there separated and went at large without finding any verdict upon the said indictment or the matters therein contained, or any of them, and this the Attorney-General is ready to verify. Wherefore he prays judgment if the said Edmond Conway ought to be discharged from the said indictment or go without a day, or if our said lady the Queen ought to be barred from further prosecuting the same.

The replication to the second plea, after the same prefatory averments as were contained in the first, was as follows.—"And the said Attorney-General further saith, that the said jurors then and there and from thenceforth remained and continued in their said private jury-room, and without meat, drink, or fire or other refreshments being had or received by the said jurors or any part of them, for a long space of time, to wit, for twelve hours, thence next ensuing; and that afterwards, and after the said jurors had so retired, and after the lapse of much more than a sufficient and reasonable time for enabling the said jurors to consider and fully deliberate upon their verdict touching the said felony and matters in said indictment mentioned, and to agree upon their verdict in case they could have at all agreed touching or respecting the same, to wit, after twelve hours had elapsed from the time of their so retiring from the said public court into their said private jury-room as aforesaid, and after all the other business of the said adjourned assizes had finished and been concluded, and when the Sabbath-day was drawing near, to wit, on the 11th day of October, 1843, being the day next after the said day on which the said Edmond Conway was given in charge to the said jurors as in said last-mentioned plea stated, the said jurors then and there came from their said private jury-room into the said open court, and then and there, in the said open court, at said adjourned assizes, there declared to and before and in the presence of the justices, and in the presence and hearing of the said Edmond Conway, then and there being present, that they, the said jurors, had not agreed upon their verdict, and that they, the said jurors, could not agree together upon any verdict upon or touching or concerning the said indictment or issue, or any of the matters therein contained; and that they, the said jurors, had not agreed together or found, and could not agree together or find, or say upon their oaths, whether or not the said Edmond Conway was guilty of the said felony or matters in the said indictment mentioned, or any of them." The replication then stated, in the same terms as the preceding one, the discharge of the jurors by the justices, and prayed judgment, &c.

To these replications, the prisoner's counsel demurred (see 3 Law T. 23), and contended that they disclosed no valid ground for the discharge of the jurors. The counsel for the Crown having joined in demurrer, the learned judge (Jackson, J.) considering the question too important to be decided in a summary way, said he would overrule the demurrer, and in case of a conviction, reserve the question for the twelve judges. The trial, accordingly, was proceeded with, and the prisoners, having been found guilty, were sentenced to be hanged on the 8th May following. But having sued out a writ of error upon the record, assigning as grounds the insufficiency of the replication, and that the demurrer ought to have been allowed, in last Hilary Term they were brought up to the bar of the Court, and the case was argued on two different days (the 22nd and 25th January). The sole question raised by the prisoner's counsel was, whether the judge below had, as averred in the replication, a discretionary power to discharge the jury, without the consent of the parties, and without the occurrence of any fatality or evident necessity for their discharge.

Friday, May 2

PERRIN, J. after recapitulating the pleadings and facts of the case, and commenting on the circumstance of there not having been a proper entry of the continuances made upon the record, and that the rule of court directing the discharge of the jurors was not entered thereon as it ought, proceeded to say: "I shall proceed to consider the only question, then, which is, as I have before stated, not whether, upon the facts as disclosed, that order for the discharge of the jury could not be legally made, nor is it whether this matter might not be pleaded in bar for another offence; but the only question is, whether the jury were legally discharged, and there could have been a fresh trial. That the old rule has varied from time to time, either as qualified, corrected, or differently understood, is unquestioned. Kinloch's case (Fost. C. L. 16)—where that general rule was expressed, and seems to have been adopted, but not to have been admitted to be universally binding—is in my mind a very weighty authority; and it is to be observed that there was no allegation there that the opinion was not questionable; the judges agreed that 'admitting the rule laid down by Lord Coke to be a good general rule, yet it cannot be universally binding, nor is it easy to lay down any rule that will be so.' I agree with that opinion, and in the very letters in which it is expressed; and if you apply the expression to this particular case, it does appear to me that this opinion is well founded, and the rule ought to be varied only in cases of evident necessity; and it therefore must depend on the facts of the case whether there be a necessity or not. The rule cannot bind where it would produce a hardship to the prisoner. It does appear to me that this opinion warrants the alteration of the old rule, and is adopted in the rule expressed by Blackstone, which has ever since been acted on. The qualification of the rule by Blackstone, which appears a legitimate adoption of the opinion of the judges in Kinloch's case, has been since followed in the cases of Rex v. Edwards (3 Campb. 207; Russ. & R. 224; and 4 Taunt. 211); Rex v. Delany (Jebb's Cr. C. 103), and Rex v. Burrell (Jebb's Cr. C. 104). The authority which I referred to as having been decided in this country, and of which I myself took a note at the time, is the case of Rex v. Kelis (1 Cr. & D. 151, and Hayes, Cr. L. 880), decided in 1829 at Carrick, where the opinion which the twelve judges had expressed was stated by Judge Fox, and he adopted the same reasoning and the same rule. I think that an authority of great weight. The objection was not taken by the counsel for the prisoner at the trial; but Judge Daly, who tried the case, reported it to the judges, who considered it; and Judge Fox, when the case came on again for trial, interrupted the proceedings, and stated the opinion of the judges, and that the prisoner ought not again to be put upon his trial. The soundness of the exception in the case of necessity is sustained by a number of authorities. The maxim quod necessitas cogit defendit, was adopted in Hardy's case, Tooke's case, and in Stone's case." [His lordship here adverted to the statement of the law in that case by Eyre, C. J. and of the necessity of having the facts duly entered upon the record, that it might appear that every thing was done according to law, and that the acts might be capable of being reviewed by a superior Court.] "If so long a time had elapsed that they (the jurors) require refreshments, and cannot deliberate without them, then, accordingly, that might be a reason why they should have refreshments; but does that render it necessary that they should be discharged? It may be said that it is equally invalid giving refreshments without the discharge of the jury, and that if you may do the one you may do the other. Now, I cannot believe it equally invalid to give them refreshment; for taking the old cases to be law, that judges brought juries round to the end of the circuit, it impossible to suppose they did not get refreshment. therefore, if that rule had been adopted, it is to be inferred that they must have had refreshment to enable them, not merely to give a verdict, but, as the old cases say, to continue inclosed. Now, the record here states that the Court below discharged the jury upon the bare ground that they had time, and more than time enough, to enable them to agree. It has been very properly observed that the judge below could see more of the circumstances than we could, and he must have seen that the men were in such a condition, and that it was a question between their losing their lives and giving a verdict, but it is enough to say that this has not been put upon the record, and we cannot go out of it on a question of this being a case of necessity. There is a further difficulty, namely, how can any person fix a time for twelve men to agree in? I think that there is a very considerable difficulty in any person recording as a matter of fact, his judgment that more than a reasonable time for those men to come to a sound conclusion had elapsed. The whole of the reason for their discharge is that they did not agree within the time the judge considered enough for them to find their verdict, and that that was a necessity for their discharge, which I cannot admit, there being nothing to shew that the jury were not in health and in full possession of their faculties. I know of no authority for such a position as that a judge of his mere discretion may discharge a jury and that that must be admitted to be a compliance with the rule; none such is alluded to in the arguments of counsel or reasoning of the Judges Foster and Wright in Kinloch's case. I recollect, even in civil cases, when juries remained in a considerable time and it has been considered that a juror could not be withdrawn except by consent." [After observing upon the method of withdrawing a juror, the learned judge went on to say], "It was a ridiculous fiction, but it showed that the judge could not of his own authority discharge him; and in the absence of any authority, civil or criminal, I am slow to be of opinion that the judge of his own discretionary power may do it. I do not acknowledge the existence of any discretionary power to act on his own notion; it would be inconsistent with justice, without grounds shewn for the act, which may be considered by a superior Court. A judge must determine, not by the crooked cord of discretion,(c) but by the golden mete-wand of the law. I admit that corruption is not to be imputed or supposed in any judge, but fallibility must be admitted—humanum est errare, neither would I subject the opinion of a judge upon matters of fact to be canvassed before, or submitted to the consideration of, juries. What the record states is not to be averred against, nor is the propriety of a judge's conduct to be submitted to the consideration of juries; but whether the rule be right or not ought to be considered, if necessary, by a superior Court; and it is no degradation to a judge to have his rule submitted to the consideration of a superior or other courts. In all cases the judge ought to consider his acts reviewable, and the errors in his judgment, if any, to be amended. And as upon this record there does not appear a case of necessity set forth by the prosecutor; and as it does not appear that the jury charged with the prisoners, and who were discharged of them, were so discharged from an evident necessity, I think there cannot be judgment for the Crown upon this record, and that the judgment ought to be reversed."

CRAMPTON, J. after referring to the pleadings, and to the informal manner in which the continuances were entered upon the record, went on to say: "However unusual or irregular the course which has been taken may be, still the Court has to decide upon the main question which is raised by this record—that is, whether or not the judge below should have allowed the demurrer and pronounced a judgment of acquittal for the prisoners, for the power of awarding a venire de novo does not apply to the present case; the main question is, whether the judge, having discharged the jury under the circumstances stated upon the record, amounts to error. There is a very important principle of the law, that a prisoner's life is not twice to be put in jeopardy; but, in the language of the law, the prisoner in this case never was tried before the assizes of March 1844. In popular language, he was tried before, but not in the language of the law; and can a prisoner in any case rely for his defence on a previous abortive trial? It appears to me, that the vice in the argument of the prisoner's counsel arises from confounding the distinction between the existence of a discretionary power in the judge below, and the exercise of that power. It must be admitted on all hands, that the old rule of refusing to discharge a jury in any event until they agreed to a verdict, and the restrictions from fire, candle-light, &c. have been departed from; and the rule laid down by Blackstone, that a jury may be discharged in a case of evident necessity, is a very decided departure from the previous practice. In many cases which have been cited, juries have been discharged without any physical or moral necessity for taking such a course; as where a juror was intoxicated, which is only a temporary cause, or where a juror takes ill, but is not so much affected as to be incapable, after a time, of resuming his duties; and yet the discharge of a jury in such cases has never been held to amount to error. Then, as it is admitted that juries can be discharged without finding a verdict in cases of evident necessity, it is my opinion that a discretionary power is vested in the judge below to discharge a jury when it appears to him that they cannot agree, and that this discretion cannot be questioned by another Court. He may act on facts coming within his own observation, and if he does discharge the jury, and makes an entry to that effect on the crown book, there can be no appeal from that order, in my opinion. The exercise of a discretion has been characterized as odious; but where the necessity exists for its exercise, a judge is bound not to shrink from the responsibility devolving on him. Let me suppose the case of an unreasonable sentence of imprisonment by a judge, and that he departed from the principles of Magna Charta by sentencing a prisoner to ten years' imprisonment for a common assault. That would be an abuse of authority which Parliament might punish, but no writ of error would lie in such a case. Look to the consequences arising from the doctrine contended for by the prisoner's counsel. Suppose the judge below had no power to discharge the jury without finding a verdict except in a case of evident necessity, what should he have done in this particular instance? How much longer were the jurors to have been kept in custody? Was it until one of the jury became incapable of acting? Was he to have brought them to the bounds of the county? or, as the old authorities go, to the last town on the circuit? It would be, in my mind, an alarming doctrine to lay down that a jury could not be discharged unless they agreed to a verdict, until some one became so ill that his life was in danger. If the jurors are to be locked up for weeks, at whose expense are they to be maintained?" [The learned judge, after a very elaborate review of Sir Wm. Witnipole's case (Cro. Car. 147), Keat's case (Skinner, 667), R. v. Wildey (1 M. & S. 183), Vaux's case (4 Co. Rep. 44 a.), Wrote v. Wigges (4 Co. Rep. 47 n. p. 407 edit. of 1826), Bushell's case and Shield's case (28 St. Tr. 619), and Sam. Gray's case (3 Law T. 449, and 8 Jur. 878), declared his opinion to be that the judgment of the Court below ought to be affirmed.]

BURTON, J.—I apprehend the whole question upon this case is whether he (the learned judge who tried the case) acted erroneously, as appears upon the record; and if he did act erroneously, it is the same as if he discharged the jury without any reason whatever; I have only to see whether the facts are sufficient to authorize the exercise of his discretion in the way he has done. Now, upon that view, except the authority goes much beyond what of late years has been considered, the grounds stated were not sufficient; and if he had other grounds (for discharging the jury) they ought to have been put upon the record; and where a judge exercises a jurisdiction of that kind, he ought to have it recorded in such a way as that the grounds of his judgment may appear. I am of opinion that a judge has not, of his own will and his own discretion, a right to discharge a jury, I think it must be the exercise of a sound discretion; the question must be, whether there are sufficient circumstances to warrant this judicial act on his part. [The learned judge, after stating that in his opinion there did not appear upon the record any sufficient reason to warrant the discharge of the jury, and commenting on the want of sufficient particularity in the averments upon the record, and that an examination into the facts which arose to induce the judge to consider it necessary to discharge the jury, proceeded to observe:] "If a jury remained in so long as to be in a condition which might endanger their health, that might be ground upon which they might be discharged; and I dare say it may be very probable that was the ground upon which the judge exercised his discretion in the present case. It may have been that there was a sufficient ground for their discharge; but he should have stated an examination into the facts, in order to be reasonably certain; and these were important facts to be stated, and ought always to be stated, and I think they have not been sufficiently stated. What I would wish to impress is not that I would yield to the old common law doctrine in all its particulars; I am well disposed to discountenance and disapprove of it; yet the reason of it ought to be acted upon, and therefore, when we act upon our authority to discharge a jury, we ought to confine it to a certain ground upon which there could be no mistake for the proper exercise of our judgment; but in this case there have not been sufficient grounds stated for the exercise of that discretion. When a jury are sworn to find a verdict between the Crown and the prisoner, he has a right to insist upon that verdict from that jury; the prisoner has as good a right to strictness on his trial as the Crown has in getting a verdict, and upon that ground I feel that it is so necessary to consider whether the jury were discharged upon right grounds or not. Whether a new indictment may be prepared against the prisoner or not, is a question it is not necessary for the Court to enter into. The question is, has this man been properly tried on the indictment as it now stands? What may be the result of our order is another question, which we have nothing to do with; but I am of opinion, with all due regard to the opinion of my brother Crampton, from whom I differ, that upon this record there is error, and an error sufficient to vitiate the judgment, and that the judge was not warranted in exercising his discretion upon the subject, as has been stated, and that this judgment ought to be reversed."

PENNEFATHER, C. J. after adverting to the facts of the case, and the objections raised by Mr. Justice Crampton, and to the dangerous consequences which might result from the doctrine that an absolute discretion was reposed in the judge without any power existing of reviewing it, and stating that he could not conscientiously say there was any evident necessity in the present case to warrant the discharging the jury without finding a verdict, said that in his opinion judgment must be given in favour of the prisoners.

(c) See the case of R. v. Walcott, 4 Mod. 401.

Judgment reversed accordingly.

Coppinger moved that the prisoners be now discharged from custody; but

Greene, S. G. on the part of the Crown, having objected to their immediate discharge, in order that the law officers of the Crown might have an opportunity of considering the expediency of suing out a writ of error to the House of Lords,

The COURT remanded the prisoners to the custody of the marshal, directing them to be brought up again on Wednesday, the 7th instant, on which day the prisoners were brought up to the bar of the court and discharged, Bennett, Q. C. having intimated that the counsel for the Crown did not intend to proceed any further in the case.

Counsel for the Crown: Smith, A. G., Greene, S. G., Bennett, Q.C., the Hon. John Plunket, Q.C., Keller, Q. C. and Daniel M'Dermot.

MEEHAN in Error v. THE QUEEN.

Where a judgment obtained at assizes is reversed in the Queen's Bench upon writ of error, but the record upon which judgment has been entered below has never formed a part of the Records of the Queen's Bench, that Court will not award a venire de novo, but will simply remand the prisoner to his former custody.

In this case the prisoner had been convicted of a felony at the Spring Assizes for the county of Clare, in the year 1844; but having at his trial been denied the right of peremptorily challenging the jurors, a writ of error was brought in the Queen's Bench on that ground, and also on the ground that he had been sentenced to transportation for life without its having been defined where he was to be transported to, and whether beyond the seas or not.

Greene, S. G. with whom was Brewster, Q. C. for the Crown, admitted that this case was governed by the case of Gray in error v. The Queen (3 Law T. 449), and submitted that the same course should be adopted as in that case, namely that the judgment should be reversed, and a venire de novo awarded.

Smyly for the prisoner contended, that though the principal question in this case was exactly the same as that raised in Gray's case, yet that the circumstances were different. Gray's case was removed into the Queen's Bench by certiorari, and thereby became a record of the court; so that the House of Lords, in reversing the judgment of the Queen's Bench, merely sent back the record into that court, with directions to amend it by issuing a venire de novo. The present case, on the other hand, came before the Court on a writ of error from an inferior Court, and as the case formed no part of the records of the Queen's Bench, the Court could not award a venire de novo, and the judgment against the prisoner being reversed, the Court could not commit him to custody again, and he ought not to be detained.

Greene, S. G.—The judgment against the prisoner may be reversed, but the indictment against him for felony stands, and he is therefore legally in custody. You may bring a habeas corpus if you like.

Brewster.—The prisoner in the eye of the law has never been tried; and, therefore, as an indictment for felony has been found against him by a grand jury, he ought still to remain in custody.

CRAMPTON, J.—Perhaps the best course would be to reverse the judgment and remand the prisoner for trial, without awarding a venire de novo at all.

Smyly.—There is another point in this case; the prisoner has been sentenced to be transported for life, without defining where he is to be transported to, or whether he is to be transported beyond the seas or not.

BURTON, J.—Yes; but if he has not been tried at all, you cannot rely on a defect in the terms of the sentence. Cur. adv. vult.

COPYHOLDS.

Copy of the Fourth Report of the Copyhold Commissioners to Her Majesty's principal Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to the Act 4 & 5 Vict. c. 35, s. 3.

PRESENTED TO BOTH HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT BY COMMAND OF HER MAJESTY.

Copyhold Commission, June 22, and July 8, 1845.

Sir,—In presenting to you our Fourth Report, we have to state that there has been again a considerable, and it is a gradually extending increase, both in the number of enfranchisements effected during the year, and in the value of the lands enfranchised, and this as well in lay as in ecclesiastical manors, though principally in the latter.

We find that we are enabled to settle the cases which are brought before us both cheaply and expeditiously, nor have we any difficulty in arranging the terms of enfranchisements when there is a fair disposition in parties to effect them.

We have also reason to believe that the terms we have laid down in enfranchisements which have passed through this office, have been adopted in similar cases by other persons who have not found it necessary to come to us, being either seized in fee or having powers to enfranchise.

In both these cases, however, parties have sometimes preferred procuring the sanction of this office by passing their deeds through it, to the letting their bargains rest on their own estimates.

We beg to add a list of the enfranchisements, which have either been completed (since our last Report), or which are now nearly ripe for completion. Some progress has also been made towards enfranchisement in many other manors. We have the honour, &c.

WILLIAM BLAMIRE.
T. WENTWORTH BULLER.
RICHARD JONES.

To the Right Hon. Sir James Graham, Bart. M.P. &c. &c.

THE FINANCES OF GREAT BRITAIN.

From the important Parliamentary paper recently published, containing an account of the public income and expenditure of the United Kingdom for the years 1843, 1844, and 1845, a few interesting facts may be collected.

It appears from a survey of the figures in the return thus printed, that the national income has been gradually increasing every year, whilst the concurrent expenditure has remained comparatively stationary. In 1842 the income amounted to 51,120,040*l.* and the expenditure to 55,195,159*l.* shewing a deficiency of 4,075,119*l.*; in 1843 the income amounted to 56,935,022*l.* and the expenditure to 55,501,740*l.* shewing a surplus of 1,433,282*l.*; and in 1844, the income of the country amounted to 58,590,217*l.* and the expenditure to 55,103,647*l.* leaving a surplus of 3,486,570*l.* which, together with the former surplus of 1,433,282*l.* formed an aggregate surplus of 4,919,852*l.* which more than covered the large deficiency of 4,075,119*l.* noticed in 1842. At that period we were suffering from the effects of Whig mismanagement and financial blundering. At present, notwithstanding the unpalatableness of the income-tax to the nation at large, the financial policy of the Peel ministry has the merit, in a great degree, of having retrieved the Treasury from its embarrassments, and restored the balance of income and expenditure to the right side of the account.

The sources whence our enormous revenue is derived chiefly consist of the following items. We select the component parts of the income received in 1844-45 (58,590,217*l.*). Customs and Excise figure for 38,576,684*l.* the relative portions of each being 23,000,000*l.* and 15,000,000*l.* in round numbers; stamps for 7,327,803*l.*; assessed and land taxes for 4,429,870*l.*; the property and income-tax for 5,329,601*l.*; the Post-office for 1,705,068*l.*; Crown lands for 441,583*l.*; ordinary revenues for 394,598*l.*; and Chinese ransom money (an extraordinary and special item) for 385,008*l.*

The expenditure is also divided into a variety of items. Last year, the cost of collecting the customs and revenue amounted to a sum of 1,406,486*l.* and with the preventive service charges amounted to 1,967,584*l.* The expenses of collecting the stamps and assessed taxes amounted to 2,860,536*l.* Thus the mere expense of collecting the revenue amounted to nearly five millions sterling, or about 1-12th.

The civil Government costs the country 1,618,265*l.* This includes a sum of 371,800*l.* from which the Queen's privy purse is supplied, and the salaries and expenses of the royal household are defrayed; a sum of 277,000*l.* for allowances to the royal family; 26,440*l.* for the Irish viceroyalty; 100,646*l.* for the salaries and expenses of both Houses of Parliament, including the printing of the vast mass of papers and documents which now lie accumulated on our tables, the growth of only one session; 538,593*l.* for "civil departments," including superannuation allowances; 277,501*l.* for other annuities; and 6,285*l.* for pensions charged on the civil list. It may be proper to state, for the information of those ignorant of the fact, and especially foreigners, that the civil list formerly included all the heads of public expenditure, except those of the army, navy, and other military departments, but is confined at present (9 Wm. 4, c. 25) to "the expenses proper for the maintenance of his Majesty's household." The Queen's privy purse does not exceed, we believe, an annual sum of about 60,000*l.* or 70,000*l.* out of the whole 371,800*l.* Under the expenses of justice is included a sum of 559,782*l.* for courts of justice, 594,312*l.* for police and criminal prosecutions, and 703,111*l.* for houses of correction, &c. The diplomatic expenses amount to 380,609*l.* annually, including 181,186*l.* for the salaries and pensions of foreign ministers, plenipotentiaries, and ambassadors; 129,303*l.* for consuls' salaries, and superannuation allowances; and 70,120*l.* for expenses of outfits, &c. The above sums are charged on the "Consolidated fund." Of those raised by annual votes of supply, there are 6,178,714*l.* for the maintenance of the army, 5,858,219*l.* for that of the navy, and 1,924,312*l.* for the expenses of the Ordnance.

1. 7 & 8 G. 4, c. 29. Certain provisions of recited Act repealed.—Whereas by an Act passed in the seventh and eighth years of his Majesty King George the Fourth, intituled "An Act for consolidating and amending the Law in England relative to Larceny, and other offences connected therewith," certain provisions were made for the prevention of dog stealing: and whereas it is expedient, for the further prevention of the said offence, that the provisions of the said recited Act, so far as relates to dog stealing, and to dealing with the offenders in respect to the said offence, shall be repealed: be it therefore enacted by the Queen's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that from and after the passing of this Act, the said provision so far as aforesaid, shall be repealed.

2. Punishment for stealing dogs: first offence second offence.—And be it enacted, that if any person shall steal any dog, every such offender shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof before any two or more justices of the peace, shall for the first offence, at the discretion of the said justices, either be committed to the common gaol or house of correction, there to be imprisoned only, or be imprisoned and kept to hard labour, for any term not exceeding six calendar months, or shall forfeit and pay, over and above the value of the said dog, such sum of money, not exceeding twenty pounds, as to the said justices shall seem meet; and if any person so convicted shall afterwards be guilty of the said offence, every such offender shall be guilty of an indictable misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof, shall be liable to suffer such punishment, by fine or imprisonment, with or without hard labour, or by both, as the court in its discretion shall award, provided such imprisonment do not exceed eighteen months.

CAP. XLVIII.

An Act to Substitute a Declaration for an Oath in Cases of Bankruptcy. (July 21, 1845.)

1. Bankrupts may be examined after making and signing declaration.—Whereas it is highly desirable that oaths shall not be administered unnecessarily by public authority, and there is reason to believe that the examination of a bankrupt or of the wife of a bankrupt before commissioners in bankruptcy will be equally effectual for obtaining a disclosure of the truth, and a full discovery of all that can be useful for the benefit of creditors, when such examination is conducted without oath: be it therefore enacted by the Queen's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that all persons who are now or shall be hereafter declared bankrupts under any fiat, or the wives of such persons respectively, shall and may be hereafter examined before such commissioners without being sworn, but after making and signing the declaration contained in the schedule hereunto annexed.

2. Penalty for making false declaration.—And be it enacted, That if any such person so to be examined shall, in the course of the examination, wilfully make any false statement, such person may be thereupon convicted of a misdemeanour, and shall be, at the discretion of the Court before which the conviction shall take place, liable to undergo the pains and penalties now by law imposed upon persons guilty of wilful and corrupt perjury.

3. Not to affect right of commissioners to commit for unsatisfactory answers, &c.—Provided always, and be it enacted, That nothing herein shall in anywise affect the right of the commissioners of bankrupt to judge how far the answers to be made are satisfactory, or to commit to prison in case they shall hold such answers to be unsatisfactory, nor the right of any commissioner or creditor to withhold his signature from the certificate of conformity.

An Act to make certain further Provisions for the Consolidation of Turnpike Trusts in South Wales. (July 31, 1845.)

1. 7 & 8 Vict. c. 91. Certain roads to become county roads.—Whereas an Act was passed in the last session of Parliament, intituled "An Act to consolidate and amend the Laws relating to Turnpike Trusts in South Wales;" and whereas in pursuance of the said Act certain commissioners have been appointed to execute the powers and authorities thereby conferred, and to carry the same into execution; but the powers of the said commissioners will cease and determine by virtue of the said Act on the twenty-ninth day of September next; and whereas it is necessary that provision should be made for carrying certain parts of the said Act into effect after such commission shall have expired, and also that some further enactments should be made for more fully accomplishing the objects of the said Act; be it therefore enacted by the Queen's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that from and after the passing of this Act the pieces of road in the schedule marked (A.) to this Act annexed shall become and shall respectively be managed and maintained as part of the county roads of the counties in which they are respectively situate.

2. Provision for roads partly situated in different counties.—And whereas the several pieces of road mentioned in Schedule (B.) to this Act annexed have heretofore been repaired and maintained as parts of certain turnpike trusts which extend respectively into two or more counties; and whereas it is expedient that such pieces of road should continue to be repaired and maintained under one uniform management, as heretofore; be it therefore enacted, That the several pieces of road mentioned in the schedule marked (B.) to this Act annexed, shall be and shall respectively be managed and maintained, and for the purposes of this Act and the above-recited Act be considered, as part of the county roads of the several counties therein specified respectively.

3. Power to make new branch road in Brecknockshire, authorized by 11 Geo. 4 and 1 Wm. 4 c. xxviii. to be made by certain trustees therein named.—And whereas by an Act passed in the eleventh year of the reign of King George the Fourth, intituled "An Act for more effectually repairing and improving several Roads in the Counties of Brecon, Radnor, and Glamorgan, and for making and maintaining several new Branches of Road to communicate therewith," the trustees for carrying the said Act into execution were empowered, amongst other things, to make and construct a certain line or branch of road commencing at or near Tavern-y-Prydd, on the turnpike-road leading from Builth to Llandovery, and thence crossing the rivers Dulas and Irvon, to Pontrhydverre, and from thence to the turnpike-road leading from the confines of the county of Caermarthen to Llandovery, and which said new line of road would extend through the several parishes of New Church, Llangammarch, and Llanwrtid, subject to the provisions and regulations of the said Act; and whereas the said line of road has not yet been made, but the same, if now constructed, would afford a complete communication between Builth and Llandovery, and would be otherwise beneficial to the said county of Brecknock; be it therefore enacted, That, subject to the provisions and restrictions contained in the said first-recited Act, all the powers conferred upon the said last-mentioned trustees by the said last-recited Act, so far as relates to the construction of the said last-mentioned line of road, shall be and the same are hereby vested in the County Roads Board of the said county of Brecknock, provided that such last-mentioned powers be exercised and the said line of road be constructed and made within five years from the passing of this Act; and such road, when completed, shall be managed and maintained as part of the county roads of the county of Brecon.

4. Awards and charges made by Commissioners under former Act confirmed.—And whereas the aforementioned commissioners have made certain apportionments by the said recited Act directed to be made, and have also made various awards and reports to her Majesty's Secretary of State for the Home Department, and the monies by the said awards directed to be paid have been paid or are in the course of payment; and to avoid any doubts as to whether in all respects the forms and directions by the said Act prescribed have been complied with, or as to whether the mode or terms of making the said apportionments, awards, and reports, on the matters contained therein, or the manner of the execution thereof, are in exact conformity with the provisions of the said Act, and to give full force and validity to the charges made or to be made in pursuance of the said Act, be it enacted that all charges made or to be made by the said commissioners, or by one or her Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, as the case may be, and purporting to be made in pursuance of the said recited Act, or of the said Act, and this Act, shall after the making thereof be good and effectual in all respects whatsoever, and according to the true intent and meaning thereof, and notwithstanding that in certain cases the said commissioners may not in all respects have complied, or may not hereafter comply with the precise forms and directions in the said Act contained, or may not have apportioned, or may not hereafter apportion, on different counties, parts of the debts of any turnpike trust, in any case in which the said commissioners have given or shall hereafter give in any report to such Secretary of State their reasons for not having made or for not making such apportionment, and such reports have been or shall be approved by such Secretary of State.

5. Provision for facilitating payments by Exchequer Loan Commissioners. Former Payments confirmed.—And be it enacted that the Public Works Loan Commissioners may pay any monies by the said awards or by any future awards directed to be paid to any parties whom it shall be made to appear to their satisfaction are the persons or bodies beneficially entitled thereto, and notwithstanding any error or omission in the aforesaid awards or reports, or the awards or reports hereafter to be made, as to the parties, or the names, or descriptions of the parties entitled thereto; and further, that all payments already made, and which the said last-mentioned commissioners would have been entitled to make, and which would have been effectual if this Act had passed previously to the making of such payments, shall be and the same are hereby confirmed.

6. Interest at Three per Cent. may be charged by Exchequer Loan Commissioners from time of payment until accounts are made up.—And be it enacted, that all charges so made, or to be paid as aforesaid, shall be valid, notwithstanding interest after the rate of three pounds per cent. per annum has been or may be charged by the said Public Works Loan Commissioners on the amount of monies paid or to be paid by them, from the date of payment thereof up to the time of making up the accounts, as by the said Act is directed, and from which period the several annuities charged or to be charged upon the said counties respectively are to become payable, although the rate of interest charged or to be charged upon such monies is not specified in the aforesaid Act.

7. Commissioners appoint trustees of monies secured upon charitable and religious trusts.—And whereas the interest of and in divers sums of money charged or secured upon the tolls of certain turnpike trusts has been heretofore conveyed to or vested in trustees, in trust to apply the proceeds thereof to certain charitable and other purposes of a public nature: and whereas in some cases the trustees of turnpike roads have heretofore acted as the trustees of such sums of money so secured, and in some cases the deeds by which such trusts were constituted have been lost, or the trustees originally appointed have died, and no new appointment of trustees has since been made, or the person in whom the legal interest in such monies is now vested have become incapacitated, or are desirous to be relieved from the burden of such trusts; and it is expedient that provision should be made for the better securing of such moneys to the uses and purposes to which the same were intended and of right ought to be applied; be it therefore enacted, That, subject to the provisions of any general Act which may hereafter be passed for the regulation of charitable trusts in England and Wales, it shall be lawful for the commissioners acting in execution of the said recited Act, in any case in which they shall find that moneys have been secured upon the tolls of any turnpike trust in South Wales upon any such charitable or public trust as aforesaid, for the execution of which trust no trustees, or no persons legally qualified or competent to act as trustees, or no sufficient number of such legal and competent trustees, exist, by order under their hands and seal to appoint or substitute such fit and proper persons as they shall determine to be the trustees, either alone or jointly with any former or existing trustees, for the purpose of receiving and applying such moneys as aforesaid to the several charitable or public purposes to which the same were intended to be and have heretofore been applied, such purposes in each case to be specified in such order of the said commissioners, and also by such order to relieve and discharge any persons now being trustees of any such trusts as aforesaid, and who shall be desirous to be so relieved and discharged from the same, and to appoint other fit and proper persons in their stead; and in every such case the order of the said commissioners so made as aforesaid shall be a good and valid appointment or discharge, as the case may be, of such trustees, without any deed or instrument whatsoever.

8. Trustees to invest the moneys awarded to them for the benefit of the trust.—And be it enacted, That such trustees so appointed as aforesaid, so soon as they shall have received such moneys as shall be awarded to them by the said Commissioners, shall forthwith invest the same in the best and most advantageous manner for the uses and purposes of such trusts respectively, regard being had as well to the nature of the security by which such principal moneys may be assured as to the rate of interest payable on the same.

9. Secretary of State empowered to extend or vary the limits of towns after the commission has terminated.—And whereas by the said first-recited Act it is amongst other things enacted, that no toll shall be taken, and that no money arising from tolls on any turnpike roads shall be laid out in paving, repairing, or cleansing any street, road, or highway within the limits of any city or market or borough town for which there shall not be any local Act, and which said limits shall be fixed and determined, for the purposes of this Act, with respect to every such city or market or borough town respectively, by the said commissioners, upon the report and recommendation of the County Roads Board acting in and for the county to which any such city or market or borough town shall belong: and whereas the limits of the several cities and market and borough towns which are subject to the powers and provisions of the said Act have been fixed and determined by the said commissioners in the manner by the said Act prescribed; but it is expedient that power should be vested in some competent authority to vary or extend such limits in any particular case, from time to time, as circumstances may require; be it enacted, That after the termination of the said commission it shall be lawful for one of her Majesty's principal secretaries of state, if he shall think fit, by order under his hand, upon the recommendation of the County Roads Board acting in and for the county to which any such city or market or borough town shall belong, from time to time to vary or extend the limits which shall have been fixed and determined for the same respectively by the said commissioners as aforesaid.

10. Repeal of part of 7 & 8 Vict. c. 91, s. 52, respecting toll for passing or repassing through any gate within a mile from boundary of county.—And whereas by the said recited Act it is enacted, that from and after the repeal of the said local Acts respectively, when any toll shall have been once taken in respect of any horse or other animal not drawing, or of any horse or other animal drawing any carriage or vehicle, at any toll-gate or bar within any of the said counties, no toll shall be thereafter taken in respect of the same horse or other animal, or in respect of the same carriage or other vehicle, on the same day (to be computed from twelve of the clock of the night to twelve of the clock in the next succeeding night), for repassing through the same gate or bar, or for passing or repassing through any other gate or bar in the same county within the distance of seven miles from the gate or bar at which such toll shall have been taken, such distance being measured along turnpike roads only, nor for passing or repassing through any gate or bar in any other of the said counties adjoining within the distance of two miles from the gate or bar at which such toll shall have been taken, to be measured as aforesaid, along and in respect of turnpike roads within either of such counties, nor within one mile, measured as aforesaid, from the boundary of such counties; be it enacted, that so much of the said recited Act enacts, that no such toll as last mentioned shall be taken for passing or repassing through any gate or bar within one mile, measured as aforesaid, from the boundaries of such counties, shall be and the same is hereby repealed.

11. Waggons on springs not to be liable to toll as caravans.—And whereas doubts have arisen as to the description of carriages which may be liable to toll according to the provisions of the said-recited Act under the denomination of caravans; be it enacted, that no waggon, wain, cart, or other such like carriage shall be liable to toll as a caravan by reason of its being constructed on springs, unless the same shall be customarily employed in the conveyance of passengers for hire.

12. County Roads Board for Carmarthen may carry out a certain agreement under 11 Geo. 4, and 1 Wm. 4, c. 16.—And whereas under and by virtue of an Act passed in the eleventh year of the reign of King George the Fourth, intituled "An Act for Inclosing Lands within the several parishes of Kidwelly, St. Mary Kidwelly, Saint Ishmael, and Pembrey, in the county of Carmarthen," a certain agreement was entered into between the commissioner for carrying out the said inclosure and the trustees of the Kidwelly trust, for constructing a line of turnpike-road along a certain embankment across the Gwendraeth Fawr river in the said county: and whereas such agreement has been only partially carried into effect: and whereas the Act constituting the said Kidwelly trust has been recently repealed under the powers conferred by the herein-before first-recited act: and whereas it is expedient to vest in the County Roads Board of the said county power to complete and carry out the said agreement in like manner as it might have been had the said Kidwelly trust continued to exist; be it therefore enacted, that the said County Roads Board of the said county may, if they shall think it expedient so to do, complete and carry out the said agreement with the commissioner acting under the Kidwelly Inclosure Act, in like manner as the trustees of the Kidwelly Turnpike Trust might have done; and that such road along the said embankment, when completed, shall become and be a part of the county roads of the said county of Carmarthen.

13. County roads boards may dispose of their vested interest in toll-houses.—And whereas the carrying into execution the said recited Act will cause several of the toll-houses now or lately vested in the trustees of the several turnpike trusts in South Wales to become useless for the purpose of toll-houses: and whereas the pulling down and disposing of the same, according to the provisions of general turnpike Acts, would be attended with great loss to the several counties in which the same are situate, and many of the said toll-houses may be disposed of and left standing without injury to any parties; be it therefore enacted, that the several County Roads Boards in South Wales in whom any freehold or other interest in such toll-houses may have become vested may make sale of or otherwise dispose of such interest, any thing in the said general turnpike Acts or in any other Act to the contrary notwithstanding: provided always, that the said County Roads Boards, before they shall proceed to dispose of any such toll-house, shall cause their interest in the same to be valued by some indifferent surveyor; and in case their interest in the same shall be any interest less than freehold such interest shall be first offered, at the price which the said surveyor shall have put upon the same, to the person to whom such freehold shall belong, or if their interest in the same shall be a freehold interest, then to the owner of the lands surrounding such toll-house, or to the lord of the manor, in case such toll-house shall have been built upon the waste; and in case any of the said parties respectively to whom such right of pre-emption may belong shall not within one month after such offer made consent to purchase the same, or in case such toll-house shall adjoin the lands of two or more owners, or shall not stand upon the waste of any manor, then the Country Roads Boards may proceed to dispose of the same by auction, or in such other manner as they shall deem most expedient.

14. As to interpretation of Act.—And be it enacted, that the words used in this Act shall be construed according to the same rules of interpretation as are prescribed in the said-recited Act.

15. Alteration of Act.—And be it enacted, that this Act may be amended or repealed by any Act to be passed in this session of Parliament.

Summary.

No incident calling for especial notice has offered since our last.

COST OF THE POOR IN MIDDLESEX.—The appendix to the 11th Annual Report of the Poor Law Commissioners contains, among other returns, one relating to the amount of money levied and expended for the relief and maintenance of the poor in each union, and for parishes not united under the Poor Law Amendment Act in England and Wales for the year ended the 25th of March, 1844, &c. It thence appears that, during that year, the amount levied by assessment for the poor-rate in Middlesex (consisting of the Finsbury, Holborn, and Tower divisions of the Ossulston Hundred, and the city and liberty of Westminster) was 348,130*l.* There was, in addition to that sum, a further amount of 19,147*l.* received from other sources in aid of the poor-rate; thus making a total received for the relief, &c. of the poor of 367,277*l.* The amount expended during the above-mentioned period in relief, &c. of the poor, in the said parishes was 175,740*l.* 19*s.*; the sum of 3,850*l.* was expended in law charges; a further amount of 508*l.* was paid to the various vaccinators, under the Vaccination Exten[illegible] Act, besides an outlay of 20*l.* for register and certificate books; 2,593*l.* was paid in way of fees to clergymen and registrars, and 65*l.* as outlay for register, offices, books, forms, and other incidental expenses, under the provisions of the Registration Act. The payments under the Parochial Assessment Acts (for survey's valuations, &c.) and loans repaid under the same, amounted to 528*l.* The payments towards the county-rate amounted to 50,846*l.*; and those towards the county and local police forces, 92,319*l.* The money expended for all other purposes amounted to 31,250*l*.; and the total parochial rate, &c. expended, to 857,721*l*. For medical relief there was an outlay, during the same period of twelve months, of 6,273*l*. in the above-mentioned parishes, which are not in union under the Poor Law Amendment Act.—Globe.

PRACTICAL NOTES.—No. IV.

PAYMENT INTO COURT.

As before explained, payment into court operates as an admission of the allegations in the declaration or count, to which, if traversed, the plaintiff would have been bound to prove, and we proceed now to apply this principle to cases of payment into court upon special counts.

Where the declaration is upon a special contract, the payment into court admits not only the contract as alleged, but also that the plaintiff is entitled to some damages upon each breach, although the plea be pleaded to one breach only. (Dyer v. Ashton, 1 B. & C. 3; Wright v. Goddard, 8 A. & E. 144; 3 Nev. & P. 361.) It follows, from the very nature of this admission, that the non-performance by the plaintiff of a condition precedent is waived by it, for if evidence of such non-performance could be received, the plaintiff would have no right of action contrary to the defendant's admission upon the record. So also it is a waiver of an objection that the action was brought too soon. Harrison v. Douglas (3 A. & E. 396; 5 Nev. & Man. 180), will afford an apt illustration of this part of the subject. That was an action upon a policy of assurance which declared that certain rules should be deemed a component part of the policy. By one of these rules the assured was not entitled to be paid, in case of a loss, till a period which was made contingent upon certain events. Money was paid into court on two of the counts, one of which was on the policy averring generally a performance by the plaintiff of all things in the policy continued to be performed on his part, and a compliance with all the conditions, &c. thereby referred to and subjoined thereto. The Court held a particular statement as to testing the tables to be a direction, and not a condition precedent, but said that, had it been a condition precedent, the payment of money into court would have been a waiver of its performance. The evidence further shewed that the period named had not arrived before the commencement of the action, but left it uncertain whether the whole payment was to be made at once or by instalments. The Court said, "There is no doubt but the action is brought too soon, and it would be a cause of nonsuit, if it was not for the paying of money into court. That admits, to some extent at least, that the plaintiff was entitled to recover. * * If the whole was to be paid at once as one entire sum, in which no distinction could be made between one part and the rest, then as the payment of money into court admitted part to be due, it would constitute an admission of the whole; but not so if it was to be paid by instalments. It lay upon the defendant to have this distinctly ascertained, because the admitting of part unexplained would operate as an admission of the whole."

Wright v. Goddard (8 A. & E. 144; 3 Nev. & P. 361), was a decision to the same effect. The declaration was in covenant for nonrepair of demised premises. It would have been bad upon demurrer, for treating the covenant to repair as an absolute one, and not noticing the exception of reasonable wear and tear, and also for not shewing that the notices to repair were in writing, and also for mixing a claim for damages on the breach of covenant to repair after notice, with the claim for breach of the covenant to repair generally. But all these defects were held to be cured after verdict by the effect of payment into court generally, which must be taken to admit some damage upon every part of the breach of covenant.

In strict accordance with this principle, in an action for wrongfully discharging the plaintiff from the defendant's service, the defendant was not allowed, after payment into court, to give in evidence, even in mitigation of damages, that the plaintiff was discharged for misconduct. This, if true, would have been an answer to the action altogether, and therefore could not be received when the record contained an admission that the plaintiff had some right of action. (Speck v. Philips, 5 M. & W. 279.)

But an important qualification of the extent of the admission must be carefully observed. Upon the same principle which decides the effect of payment into court upon the general indebitatus counts, a defendant does not admit the allegations in a special count more precisely than the plaintiff has bound himself to prove them, if put in issue by non assumpsit. Cooper v. Blick (2 Q. B. 915) is the case which best illustrates this; and, in the course of the argument, all the principal previous cases were quoted. The declaration there stated, that in consideration that plaintiff would enter into defendants employ, to wit, in the capacity of editor of a newspaper, at and for a certain salary, to wit, at the rate of 400*l. per annum*, and would continue in their service till the expiration of three months after notice to determine the contract, defendants promised to employ him in the said capacity at the said salary, and to continue him in the service till the expiration of three months after notices, &c., or to pay him a proportionate part of the salary for three months, but that plaintiff had been dismissed without notice or the three months' salary. Defendant paid 37*l*. 10s. into court generally. On the trial, plaintiff did not prove the contract for 400*l*. but relied on the payment into court as an admission of the amount. The judgment then delivered by Patteson, J. is so much to the point that we give it at length. He said:—"There was no proof in this case of a specific contract to serve as editor, but it is contended that the payment into court admits that contract, and I agree that it does. The videlicet as to that has no operation; the averment must be material. But the amount of salary also is laid under a videlicet. As to the effect of that averment, the true test is whether, if non assumpsit had been pleaded, the plaintiff would have been bound to prove the amount as laid. The payment admits a contract, but only to that extent to which the plaintiff is bound to prove it. The admission cannot tie the defendants where the plaintiff would be loose. The strongest case cited for the plaintiff was Preston v. Butcher (1 Stark. N.P.C. 3), but it does not go the length the argument here would carry it. The ruling shews that the plaintiff there was bound, notwithstanding the videlicet, to prove a specific contract, an agreement for some given amount, but not that he was obliged to prove the precise amount named in the declaration. None of the cases shew that in a declaration of this kind a particular sum is material. In declaring on a bill of exchange the sum is so, but there (as Mr. Whitehurst observed) it is matter of description. The amount of salary here was not so. As the plaintiff lays it under a videlicet for his own safety he must take the consequence, namely, that the defendants were not bound to the allegation so made. Had the videlicet been omitted, the same test would have been applied, the plaintiff would have been bound to the precise statement, and the defendant's admission, by paying into court, would have bound him in the same manner. The sum is not in its nature material, and is not made so by these pleadings."

The effect of a videlicet was stated by the same learned judge, in the course of an argument, thus tersely and clearly: "A videlicet cannot make that immaterial which is in its nature material, though the omission of it may render that material which would otherwise not be so."

Effect of payment into court upon the costs.—The plaintiff does not, by taking the sum paid into court, and discontinuing the action, bring himself within the operation of the Acts relating to Courts of Request, and lose his costs; but at the same time the defendant is not precluded from entering a suggestion to deprive him of the costs, if the action was really brought for less than the sum required by the particular Act to give the plaintiff costs. (Jordan v. Berwick, 9 M. & W. 3; 1 D.N.S. 102.) So the acceptance of the sum paid in does not bring the plaintiff within the operation of 43 Geo. 3, c. 46, s. 3, which gives the defendant costs where the plaintiff arrests him without probable cause for a sum greater than is afterwards recovered. Recovery means recovery by judgment. Davey v. Renton (2 B. & C. 711; Brooks v. Rigby (2 A. & E. 21; 2 Nev. & M. 3.) The reason is that the plaintiff may have been induced to accept the smaller sum to avoid further expense in litigation. But this probability was disregarded by the judges in framing the rules for taxation of costs, as it is expressly provided, that where the sum recovered or paid into Court, and accepted by the plaintiff in satisfaction of his demand, does not exceed 20*l*. the costs are to be taxed upon the lower scale. (R. G. T. T. 7 Vict.) In actions upon securities bearing interest, care should be taken to pay in a sufficient sum to cover the interest to the time of paying in the money, for if this is not done, the plaintiff may proceed and will recover the amount of interest left unpaid. Kidd v. Walker (2 B. & Ad. 705). We have now touched on the most practical points connected with the payment of money into Court, and in conclusion we shall merely refer to some other cases which it would be necessary to insert, if we proposed to give a complete view of the subject in all its bearings. These cases are Jones v. Gooday (9 M. & W. 736); Handcock v. Foulkes (9 M. & W. 131); Gould v. Oliver (2 M. & Gr.); Bulwer v. Horne (4 B. & Ad. 132); Bailey v. Sweeting (12 M. & W. 616); Fischer v. Aide (3 M. & W. 486); and other cases cited in 1 Wms. Saund. 33 l. 6th edit. Henry v. Earl (8 M. & W. 228); Brune v. Thompson (4 Q. B. 543). E. W.

THE BOND.

41. If the trader, upon his appearance in Court, (not having established any objection to his creditors' proceedings) shall refuse to admit the demand, and shall not make a deposition that he has a good defence to it, "then and in either of the said cases, it such trader shall not, within fourteen days after personal service of such summons, or within such enlarged time as may be granted to him in that behalf, pay, secure, or compound for such demand to the satisfaction of such creditor, or enter into a bond in such sum, and with two sufficient sureties as such Court shall approve of, to pay such sum as may be recovered in any action which shall have been brought, or shall thereafter be brought, for the recovering of the same, together with such costs as shall be given in such action," (5 & 6 Vict. c. 122, 11), he will render himself liable to be made a bankrupt.

WITHIN WHAT TIME THE BOND MUST BE GIVEN.

42. The trader must enter into the bond within fourteen days after personal service of the summons, or such enlarged time as the Court may think fit to grant for that purpose.

Chap. VI.

THE ACTS OF BANKRUPTCY.

50. Trader not appearing to summons, or appearing and not admitting demand, shall not, within fourteen days, pay, secure, compound, or give bond. By 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122, s. 13, it is enacted, "That if any such trader so summoned as aforesaid, shall not come before such Court at the time appointed (having no lawful impediment made known to and proved to the satisfaction of the Court, at the said time, and allowed), or if any such trader upon his appearance to such summons as aforesaid, or at any enlargement or adjournment thereof (as the case may be), shall refuse to admit such demand, and in either of the said cases, if such trader shall not, within fourteen days after personal service of such summons, or within such enlarged time as may be granted to him in that behalf, pay, secure, or compound for such demand to the satisfaction of such creditor, or enter into a bond in such sum, and with two sufficient sureties, as such Court shall approve of, to pay such sum as shall be recovered in any action which shall have been brought, or shall thereafter be brought, for the recovering of the same, together with such costs as shall be given in such action, every such trader shall be deemed to have committed an act of bankruptcy on the fifteenth day of the service of such summons, provided a fiat in bankruptcy shall issue against such trader within two months from the filing of such affidavit."

The above section points out two several cases in which the trader-debtor may commit an act of bankruptcy:—

1st. If the trader shall not appear to the summons (having no lawful impediment made known to, and proved to the Court at the said time, and allowed);

And 2ndly, If upon his appearance to the summons, or at any enlargement or adjournment thereof (as the case may be), he shall refuse to admit his creditor's demand, and shall not make a deposition that he has a good defence to any action that may be brought against him to recover the same, then in either of the above cases, if such trader-debtor shall not, within fourteen days after personal service of the summons, pay or secure, or compound for the demand, to his creditor's satisfaction, or enter into a bond, with two sufficient sureties, for the payment of any sum which his creditor may recover against him in any action brought for the recovering of his demand, together with costs, he shall be deemed to have committed an act of bankruptcy on the fifteenth day after personal service of the summons, provided a fiat shall issue against him within two calendar months from the filing of such affidavit.

WHAT SHALL BE DEEMED A REFUSAL TO ADMIT.

51. Provided that, if any such trader so summoned as aforesaid, shall, upon his appearance before such court, refuse to sign the admission in that behalf required as aforesaid, whatever may be the nature of his statement, or whether he makes any statement or not, it shall be deemed for the purpose of this Act that every such trader thereby refuses to admit such demand: provided always, that it shall be lawful for such Court, upon reasonable cause shewn, to enlarge the time for calling upon such trader to state whether or not he admits such demand, or any part thereof. (5 & 6 Vic. 122, s. 16.)

TIME, HOW COMPUTED.

52. By General Rules and Orders, Nov. 12, 1842, Rule 43, it is ordered that, "In all cases in which any particular number of days is above-described, or shall be mentioned in any of these Rules and Orders, or any other rule or order of Court, for the doing of any Act, the same shall be reckoned in the absence of any expression to the contrary, exclusive of the first and inclusive of the last day, unless the last day shall happen to fall on a Sunday, Christmas-day, Good Friday, or a day appointed for a public fast, or thanksgiving, in which case the time shall be reckoned exclusive of that day also."

In a case in the Common Pleas where the plaintiff had proceeded as well by action as by summoning the defendant under 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122, ss. 11 and 13, before the Court of Bankruptcy, for the purpose of having the debt admitted, and the defendant had, in consequence of such proceedings in Bankruptcy, paid the debt:—it was held that defendant could not stay the proceedings in the action without, at the same time, paying the costs. (Covington v. Hogarth, 4 Law T. 157).

The fiat must issue within two months from the filing of the creditor's affidavit.

LEGAL INTELLIGENCE.

POWER OF THE CORONER TO HOLD AN INQUEST TOUCHING FIRES.—The late extensive fire in Aldermanbury, having induced Mr. Payne, the city coroner to revive the ancient practice of inquiry into the cause of all burnings within his district, we think it advisable to give a full report of this, the first inquest of the kind, since the old custom had fallen into disuetude.

On Friday last a jury of the inhabitants of the ward of Cripplegate Within were empanelled before Mr. W. Payne, the City coroner, at the school-house, Philip-lane, Aldermanbury, to inquire into the cause of the late fire on the premises of Messrs. Bradbury and Co., Manchester warehousemen, of Aldermanbury.

The investigation, from its novelty, ited considerable interest, several of the common council of the ward, together with the civic authorities, being present.

The Coroner, on taking his seat, said he would take the liberty of stating, as the present was rather a novel proceeding, why he had called them together. Latterly the number of fires in London had considerably increased, and when they took into consideration that nothing was so fearful as fire, they would be of opinion with him, that when they had the power to inquire into the causes of such fires, nothing could be more important to the public at large than that the cause should be closely investigated. The ancient authorities showed that in olden times it was the practice of the coroner to inquire into all burnings within his district, and that power still belonging to the coroner, although grown into disuetude, he thought they would be of opinion with him that it was most important that it should be again brought into force. In Horne's Mirror of Justice, the duties of a coroner were clearly laid down, and among those duties the coroner was to inquire of all burnings, whether they were caused by felony or mischance. If they were of opinion that they had been set on fire with a felonious intent, then it was their duty to inquire and ascertain what party was guilty of that felony. It was clear, therefore, in the olden time, that part of the coroner's duty was to inquire into all burnings, and he need not say how necessary it was to revive it at the present time. No one had the power to inquire into the causes of a fire, not even a magistrate, unless a party was in custody charged with causing it. The persons living in the neighbourhood of a fire were always most anxious to know how it occurred, and he thought the public would consider that he had done no more than his duty in causing a jury to be summoned to inquire into the circumstances of the late fire, who also might, by any suggestions thrown out, prevent, in a great measure, fires being so numerous. He had directed a number of persons to be summoned to give evidence as to the cause of the recent fire in Aldermanbury, so that they might come to a proper verdict whether it was caused by accident or otherwise.

The following is the form of oath administered to the jury:—"You shall well and truly inquire, on behalf of our Sovereign Lady the Queen, how a certain house and premises in Aldermanbury were lately burnt, and a true verdict give, according to the evidence, so help you God." Asher Cousins, a packer in the service of Messrs. Bradbury, Greatorex, and Beall, discovered the fire about twenty minutes before eight o'clock on Monday night, in the cellar under the packing room. The smoke was coming up through an iron grating, and on his going into the cellar, which was used for keeping boxes and papers in, he saw a pile of paper on fire. He tried to put the fire out, but was unable. No one was in the cellar when he went down. The witness at great length explained the relative positions of various gas lights on the premises, and stated that it was usu. to light them by means of wax-tapers, and paper.

Several witnesses employed upon the firm, whose evidence went to shew that the fire originated beneath the grating, in the packing-room, and immediately underneath a gas-light in that room, but no one could tell who lit that gas light on the evening of the fire, having been examined,

Mr. Braidwood said, having heard the evidence, he was of opinion that the fire originated from a light dropping through the grating amongst the paper in the cellar.

Mr. Beall, one of the partners, said he recollected that about half an hour before the fire occurred, he lit one of the gas lights with a piece of paper, which he th w upon the floor, and placed his foot upon. After a most patient investigation into all the circumstances of the case, the jury returned a verdict—"That the fire was caused by accident."

PROCLAMATIONS OF OUTLAWRY.—Thursday being County-Court day, Mr. Hemp, the officer to the sheriff, made proclamation in the usual manner against the following at the suit of their several creditors:—William le Poer Trench; Alexander Dalgleish; John R. Brinckman, otherwise Broadhead Gilbert Ainslie Young; Sir Henry Wyatt; H. C. S Irving; Charles Irving; the Rev. George Bridges Lee Warner (clerk); Hon. Percy Drummond, at the suit of three several creditors; William Randall; Joseph Ferdinand Count Taaf; Richard Fulke Greville, commonly called the Hon. R. F. Greville; Sir C. E. Grey, Bart.; Richard Gay; Patrick Leonard O'Rielly; Charles White; John Hunter; Henry Whitaker; Alexander Roper; and B. L. Vulliamy.

ELECTION OF A JUDGE.—A meeting of the Commissioners of the Westminster Court of Requests was held at the court on Monday, to nominate the candidates for the office of judge or assessor to the court, agreeably to the provisions of the Small Debt Act. There was a full attendance of commissioners. Mr. Green, of Soho-square, was elected chairman; and Mr. Cuff, the clerk, proceeded to read over the applications from the various barristers and solicitors, candidates for the appointment. Most of the candidates were backed by a long list of testimonials from judges and gentlemen of the legal profession among them were Mr. Keane, Mr. Moylan, M.. Horry, Mr. Thomas, and Mr. Campbell, all barristers. The solicitors are Mr. Le Breton, clerk to the parish of St. Martin-in-the-Fields; Mr. A'Beckett, of Golden-square; and Mr. Howorth, of High-street, Camden-town. Monday next is the day for the election. The contest will be very close. The number of commissioners for the nine parishes of Westminster is 288; but not more than half have qualified so as to entitle them to vote.

THE GAME LAWS IN WILTS.—It is a remarkable fact, that there is not, at the present time, one individual confined in either of the prisons in this county for offences against the Game Laws; nor has there been one of this description of offenders in confinement for six week past, although the county abounds with preserves and coursing-grounds as much, probably, as any shire in the kingdom, and although there are petty sessions held weekly in about twenty places within the county.

CAPRICES OF JUSTICES.—It appears that it is much safer to shoot a man in a duel than to chastise him for an insult. On the Northern Circuit, Mr. Potter, the son of the mayor of Newcastle, was convicted of an assault on Mr. Hernaman, the editor of the Newcastle Journal. The provocation, we have have been informed, was very great, the family of Mr. Potter having been attacked in a series of personal articles. The judge, Mr. Justice Cresswell, in passing sentence of two month's imprisonment, admonished the defendant as follows:—"I find in your affidavit, that after complaining of the paragraphs appearing you state, that 'under these distressing circumstances, and seeing every probability of a continuance of these attacks, and being satisfied that no legal remedy existed in such a case—deeply sensible of the injury, with your feelings intensely excited, you determined to inflict public chastisement on the writer.' See what you have stated,—that you, the son of the chief magistrate of the town, who is bound to maintain the peace, and the person who, of all others, should set an example of obedience to the law, contemplated that which you have done, for we find you thinking over and gravely deciding what the law forbids, and that not in anger; knowing the law, you would not do that which the law required, but you then proceeded wilfully and deliberately to violate that law. It is impossible I can, sitting in this place, for one moment sanction that paragraph in your affidavit. What system of things would exist in this country, if men in a state of anger and excitement, should on insufficient grounds take the law into their own hands? The bonds of society would be broken asunder, and the strongest arm would prevail. It is necessary that this sort of feeling should be put down, and the majesty of the law vindicated." Had Mr. Potter called out Mr. Hernaman and shot him, the majesty of the law would have required no vindication. You may with impunity take the law into your own hands in the shape of pistols, but not in that of a cane or whip. When the House of Lords tried Lord Cardigan for shooting Mr. Tuckett, none of the judicial members of the House saw occasion to make the reflection, "What system of things would exist in this country if men, in a state of anger and excitement, should on insufficient grounds take the law into their own hands?" There was no apprehension that the bonds of society would be broken asunder, and that the truest aim would prevail; and no sort of necessity was felt for the vindication of the majesty of the law. On the contrary, the Chief Justice Denman complimented Lord Cardigan on his acquittal of the charge of which he was notoriously guilty. If the noble lord had struck a gentleman with anything but lead, the case would have been different, and the whole frame and constitution of society, together with the majesty of the law, would have been jeopardized. The judge's lesson to the son of the mayor as to the peculiar duty of one so related to maintain the peace, and set an example of obedience to the law, was very becoming; but it is a pity that all magistrates do not, on similar occasions, hold the same language. Not very long ago the son of a judge, Mr. Bruce, who took the law into his own hands, and committed an outrage, was exceedingly complimented by that most judicious magistrate, Mr. Jardine. We do not dispute or question the propriety of a syllable of Mr. Justice Cresswell's sentence; but it seems odd that the same doctrine is not applied to graver offences of the next class, and that the duel has impunity while the minor offence of assault is so differently treated.—Examiner.

THE REBECCAITE CONVICTS.—Active measures are now in progress in the town of Neath for the purpose of petitioning her Majesty, praying for a remission, or at least an amelioration, of the punishment now being undergone by the individuals who were engaged in the Rebeccaite disturbances.—Welshman.

THE CONVICTED FOREIGNERS.—A letter has been received by E. S. Drewe, esq. high sheriff of Devon, from the Secretary of State, directing that the seven condemned, but respited foreigners, shall be treated as other convicted felons, but not allowed to hold communications with each other in the airing-grounds.

LAW CHANGES.—During the present week it has been rumoured that the Right Hon. David Boyle is about to resign his high situation as Lord Justice-General of Scotland, and to be succeeded by Duncan M'Neil, esq., Lord Advocate. Should the event take place, we consider it will be another unprecedented leap from the bar to the highest station on the Bench, over the heads of more deserving men.

BOROUGH AND WATCH RATES.—An Act was passed on the 8th ult. for the better collecting borough and watch rates. By the Municipal Corporations Act, authority was given to the councils of boroughs in certain cases to levy borough-rates and also watch-rates; but it seems that the powers given have been found insufficient for the purpose. It is now provided that overseers for parts of parishes and places within boroughs may raise district rates, which are to be allowed and published. There is authority given to recover the rates so made, and persons on account of their poverty may be excused from payment.

THE WHITECHAPEL DISTILLERY CASE.—We are informed that although the cause with respect to this affair has been concluded, and the penalty inflicted on Messrs. Smith, on account of the Excise authorities, for the imputed irregularities with which they were charged has been paid, yet the firm are not permitted to transact the smallest amount of business, either in the shape of manufacturing operations, or of the disposal of any portion of their stock, until that part of the establishment appropriated to rectifying purposes has been entirely removed. We do not vouch for the correctness of this statement, but we have reason to believe that it is perfectly so. It is understood that if the firm think proper to remove the said stock to the premises of another distiller, the Excise will make no objection to its being permitted, at the pleasure of the owners, into the stocks of retail dealers; but they will not issue permits for any portion of it to be delivered from the Whitechapel premises until the conditions beforementioned shall have been complied with. It is further understood that the firm object to this, on the ground of the immense expense which would attend its removal, independently of the inconvenience of such a proceeding, and therefore they are exposed to the enormous expense of sustaining the greater portion of their extensive establishment until the whole of the rectifying house shall be entirely removed.

A suit which has been pending between the French gilders and Mr. Elkington, of Birmingham, has been finally decided by the Court of Cassation. The question was, whether a patent obtained in France by Mr. Elkington for a process of gilding by immersion was or was not valid. The Tribunal de Première Instance decided that it was bad; but the Cour Royale, on an appeal to it by Mr. Elkington, declared it to be good. The gilders resorted to the Court of Cassation, which has confirmed the judgment of the Cour Royale, and established the patent

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

SIR, -The Profession generally, and in that term I include the highly respectable 200 metropolitan proctors, will have read with much gratification my exposé of the doings and sayings in the Prerogative Registry, Doctors' Commons, and as I have again set my hand to the work, viz. to enlighten the public through the Profession, and thereby effect a clearance in the antiquated civil rookery of Doctors' Commons, I now trouble you with additional particulars on this truly important subject, and thus fulfil my last week's promise that you should again hear from me shortly. I beg, therefore, to state, that whilst I give publicity to the details of the various steps taken by me throughout this important disclosure, I hold it as a sacred duty, that every fact should be properly authenticated, and so relieve your journal from all responsibility, and preserve that character for integrity with the Profession and the public, that I have for the last half-century fully maintained as a public servant; and, as I have further important communications to make on this matter, and am desirous of stating each one as shortly as possible, consistently with a view of enabling the Profession thoroughly to understand the subject, and yet save your pages, as far as I can, conformably with the deep interest that you, Sir, and the various legal branches, now take in this affair,—I herewith inclose the copy-petition presented by Mr. Duncombe, and, by the order of the House of Commons, laid on its table for future consideration. After the due circulation of this petition, through your columns, I will address you further on the subject. The Profession will see by the prayer of the undermentioned petition, that had Mr. Dyneley and myself been called to its bar and examined, as therein prayed, the NAMES of the lost wills must have been disclosed. I am, Sir, yours, &c.

J. T. SCOTT,
Doctors' Commons.

(Copy.)

To the Right Honourable the House of Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland in Parliament assembled,

The humble petition of John Thomas Scott, of Bell-yard, Doctors' Commons, in the city of London, gentleman, Sheweth,—That her Majesty's Government have had a plan under consideration for an alteration and amendment of the Ecclesiastical Courts, and for the better security and custody of their public documents.

That your petitioner was for thirty years a clerk in the Prerogative Will Office, Doctors' Commons, when he was suddenly dismissed by the senior deputy-registrar, Mr. Dyneley.

That your petitioner believes the ground of such dismissal arose from his knowledge of the facts hereafter mentioned, viz.:—

The loss of a whole bundle of original wills out of the office, conveying real and personal estates to an immense amount, and involving interests divisible amongst a numerous class of persons, which happened a short time before the appointment of the said Mr. Dyneley.

That shortly after Mr. Dyneley entered upon his appointment, he exercised all the patronage of the said establishment, and, in particular, promoted the gentleman who was the cause of the loss of the said original wills.

That the person who so lost the said wills, with the knowledge of the said Mr. Dyneley, communicated to your petitioner the circumstances under which the said public documents were lost, and, with the full knowledge of the said Mr. Dyneley, your petitioner has resorted to every means for their recovery, but without effect.

That your petitioner was bound down by a solemn oath not to disclose the said loss, and promised faithfully not to do so, unless your petitioner survived the said gentleman who lost them.

That, in consequence of the death of the beforementioned gentleman, and the alterations contemplated by her Majesty's Government with regard to the said office, your petitioner has been advised to come forward and make the present disclosure, in order that a better means of public security may be provided for the said public documents, and that her Majesty's Government may authorize a proper investigation of the present system of management, with a view to amendment.

And your petitioner therefore humbly prays that your Honourable House will institute a parliamentary inquiry of the above facts, by summoning to the bar of your Honourable House not only your petitioner, but the said Mr. Dyneley, and such other persons that will be named by your petitioner, as well as with a view to an alteration of the said law as regards the custody of wills, as also for the public service, and the benefit of the various parties interested in the lost documents mentioned in this petition, or for the adoption of such other means as your Honourable House may deem necessary.

And your petitioner, as in duty bound, will ever pray. JOHN THOMAS SCOTT

LEGAL EDUCATION.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

SIR.—I lately saw some remarks respecting legal education in one of the public journals, after reporting an address got up and presented by a deputation from one of the legal societies to the Lord Chief Justice; and, permit me to add, that if some such plan was carried out, it would not only benefit the public, but ourselves likewise, and greatly tend to aggrandise our Profession; but allow me to suggest some observation the hope of promoting the advancement of the Profession, as regards the character of Attorneys and Solicitors.

The thoughtless system of our education of young men generally is deeply to be lamented. What can a boy fifteen or sixteen years of age be expected to know when sent from the boarding-school, under such tuition as is generally prevalent among most of the minor schools, partly for want of knowledge and ability in those whose duty it should be to promote the requisite education, and partly for want of encouragement or the means among those who send their children to be educated. Let me not be misunderstood; I do not forget to draw the distinction between some youths whose ability alone pushes them over great obstacles; but there is a large majority who slumber for want of better teachers and better parents; all must not rest with either one or the other. This is called an improving age; we see and experience innumerable changes in all things, but the principle of our laws will ever remain the same; and if we wish to uphold them, and the respectability of our position in society, we must not lose sight of the groundwork on which they are based, and that is, an efficient and suitable education for those who are intended to be introduced into the Profession.

In the first place it is a sad, mistaken, and ill-judged notion in us, to say that one son shall be a lawyer and another a parson, and so on, without waiting till that period arrives in which we may be better able to form a notion of the ability of the boy, and what it indicates. And then, again, how highly injudicious it is, to bring a boy from school at the early age of sixteen, with the meagre education which in general he possesses, and so greatly inadequate for so responsible a station in life as that of a legal adviser. He scampers through arithmetic, perhaps begins Euclid, and runs through Virgil a few pages, at the same time knowing his Latin Grammar very imperfectly: then he is snatched away most probably at the very time he first feels a liking for letters, and is just beginning to think; he is then, I repeat, at this very critical time, taken away from school, placed in an attorney's office, and very often against his inclination, either because its the most gentlemanly profession or else the most money-making one, and then the first book put before him is Blackstone, as if it were the mere spelling-book of our laws, instead of deeply digested lectures upon them, fit only for the study of a previously well-trained mind.

Many will say we cannot afford to go to so great an expense with our children's education; then why think of putting them to the law? I need not tell many of my readers the why and the wherefore such presumption exists. Young men in general enter a solicitor's office under one serious and prevailing evil that they are titled "gentlemen," and beyond the mere distinction, they do not give themselves any further trouble to think about the matter. They soon see the difference, and too quickly, between the "gentleman-clerk" and the efficient working-clerk, and this glaring difference, so unwisely supported and encouraged, is what creates a vast deal of unpleasant radical feeling (if I may be allowed to use the phrase) between the two classes of clerks, and, what is worse than all, a great deal of idleness in both.

I have many more observations I could wish to lay before your readers, many of whom have families, or the care of others' children, to train up in our profession; but, before I proceed further, it may be as well to see whether you think these few preliminary remarks worth insertion; and it also becomes me to submit them with due deference to you and your readers, and as they are submitted, you will best be able to judge of their merit; at all events, many things I say I am sure will not prove unacceptable, especially if placed with earnest sincerity before those now treading the green path of our profession, and learning the way, as they should do, to become an ornament to it, and not a jest and a scorn for those whose imprudence and misfortunes bring them under the painful pangs and infliction of the law.

Trusting to your patience,
I am, Sir, your most obedient servant,
August 1845. VIRTUTIS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

SIR,—Not so hard upon the daily Times! it is longs its duty.

Has it never struck you how hard that journal fought to save the degrees and status of every University-man. Re Ward and The University of Oxford? Remember its benign object was defeated, and thus the rank of University-men are periled.

This is not all; the Rev. Mr. Ward's case is virtually decided by Mr. Pyke's a month or two since.

Can you wonder at the Times being sore?

Both University-men and barristers are no longer the free men they were!

The Times paper is largely read by the attorneys. That body to a man know they have now no chance at the Bar, having been warned, through the side of Mr. Pyke, who was a solicitor prior to his becoming a student, and before his call to the Bar, as well as a reporter when at the Bar; both reporters and solicitors, therefore, know the meaning of forthcoming events by the shadows that have recently gone before.

CONVEYANCING ACT.

THE Act of the last session for abbreviating the language of conveyances has excited needless alarm in some quarters. This is being over-sensitive, and will weaken the influence of the lawyers when they have a real grievance to complain of. The provisions of the Act are not compulsory, but optional. Substantially, it does no more than that which common sense would dictate—namely, that a certain short formula should bear the same meaning in law as a certain long formula. They who prefer the long one are still permitted to use it; but it was manifestly fair to those who required or preferred a shorter form, that they should be able to employ it with safety.

We appeal to the experience of every member of the Profession, whether his greatest difficulty in dealing with small properties has not always been the verbosity of the conveyance, occasioning needless cost in stamps—whether he would not continually have welcomed a safe short form as the most valuable boon that could have been presented to him. In proof of this, we have the fact, that Precedents of Concise Conveyances, from COVENTRY'S downwards, have been the most eagerly sought, the most largely purchased, the most generally used. The Act of last session gives to that which was before a dangerous experiment, the sanction of the law. It legalizes the concise forms of COVENTRY and other curt conveyancers. Small properties may now be transferred at less cost—a cost not desired by the solicitor, which does not profit him, which he was ever seeking to avoid, though he feared to depart from established precedent.

For these reasons, and speaking, not from conjecture, but from practical experience, we are of opinion that the Act in question is really a boon to the Profession, and will be welcomed by them as a relief from one of their greatest difficulties—how to draw a short conveyance of a small property.

THE BAR AND THE ATTORNEYS.

IT will be remembered by our readers, that, in an article under this head, some four weeks ago, we combated the arguments used by Mr. BIRD, for taking instructions and fees from prisoners without the intervention of an attorney. In that article we gave Mr. BIRD credit for purity of motive and for manliness in openly avowing his intention, though the practice was directly opposed to our views

By the merest accident, a copy of TREWMAN'S Exeter Flying Post, of the 21st inst. fell into our hands on Monday last, in which, to our surprise, we found a letter on this subject, addressed, not to the Editor of that journal, according to the usual custom of newspaper correspondence, but directly to us. No copy of this letter, nor any intimation of its existence, had been forwarded to us. Had Mr. BIRD applied for the insertion of his letter in this journal, he would have found our columns open to him. As it is, he shall have the benefit of our circulation. The readers of the LAW TIMES, especially those who have been acquainted with it from the first number, will know right well how to appreciate such a letter as Mr. BIRD'S.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

MR. EDITOR,—Your youth and inexperience entitle you to indulgence at my hands; for adherence to rules, in disregard of principles, so far from being confined to juveniles, is the prevailing, predominant error of age. I, too, have sinned in having so long sacrificed sense to sound, substance to shadow, common sense and common honesty to the cold, ... lling cant of a false honour and a figurative dignity. Duty dictates an atonement, and weak and despicable should I be, if, in leading a forlorn hope against a citadel defended by you, Sir, and others, my learned friends, acting by and with the advice of a Devon Sessions Bar, I was not equally prepared to fall as to fight in the breach. If my cause be just, my consolation is, that others will carry the fortress o'er my corse.

You, Sir, contend for a rule, which ought, in my opinion, to be an EMANATION from, not an EXTINCTION of a principle. I contend for the principle itself, which admits of neither concession nor compromise From the representative of my Sovereign, in the face of my country, at the risk of ruin, I respectfully, but firmly demanded a right, with a view to elevate in public estimation every branch of our profession; to rouse the Bar to a keen sense of its servility and degradation; to shame them out of the abasing apostasy from their once independent, honourable character of patrons, to the abject condition of patronized, and to sliver asunder the chain which converts them into participants in the infliction of both private and public wrong; but you, Sir, with others, impelled by the indiscretion and inexperience of youth, in your misguided emulation, rush to rivet their self-forged fetters. Our country and posterity will judge us. Their judgment I decline not, but demand, and will stand or fall by their award.

Meaning fairly by your country, the columns of your paper will be open to my defence. I ask it not, but only "A FAIR FIELD, AND NO FAVOUR;" and if the Exeter or England's Press do not abandon me, hope to evince sufficient moral firmness to shape my destiny as duty shall direct.

As that defence will be addressed through you to a reasoning, reflecting, a rapidly enlightening people, I must not deceive them nor suffer you, Sir, to seduce them into a false estimate of my character. Your protest against my principle I with pleasure accept; your panegyric, I, in courteous candour, reject. For what purpose, Sir, do you raise such a hecatomb of UNWORTHIES, to make such a pompous parade of my purity? Read my proscribed Letter to the Attorney-General! I therein declare that "professional and personal INTERESTS I have, and will defend them; that personal resentments I have none. That the affectation of superiority o'er our common nature I despise, and the cant of patriotism shews to me rather the lust than the love of fame." These my INTERESTS are identified with a GE... PUBLIC PRINCIPLE, in defending one I defend all. Look, Sir, "THROUGH NATURE UP TO NATURE'S GOD," and you will see that by [illegible] purp[illegible] ...complished,

From seeming evil still educing good.

The frailties, the frivolities of the Bar I deeply deprecate and deplore. It were inanity to deny, impiety to defend them. Still with that Bar, as a national safeguard, to preserve the purity of power, without which there is no peace nor prosperity for the people; regulated by rul... based on a ...rential recognition of, not on the abrogation of principle, ...ivil institution, ancient or modern, can bear a comparison. Do you know, Sir, the sacrifice you demand? It i... that law, justice, and truth, a people's rights, a nation's freedom, shall be silently surrendered, and to what? to professional ETIQUETTE. This ... ur own language!

Calm reason's holy laws,
The voice of God within th' attentive mind forbid it. Oh

Thought young men
Of these, and all the thousand nameless ills
That constantly beset fair freedom's path,
Pride in his high career would stand appall'd,
And headless rambling impulse learn to think.

Correction, I, in good faith, seek; and fair confutation will, in grateful cordiality, hail; for my prayer is, "MAY GOD PRESERVE THE RIGHT," whether maintained by one man or the million, by you, Sir, or

PROFESSIONAL MALPRACTICES.

WE have received from an unknown correspondent the following letter, on the highly censurable and unprofessional conduct of some barristers at the Central Criminal and Bankruptcy Courts, in taking briefs from non-professional persons:—

SIR,—The members of the Profession expect impartial justice at your hands. The conduct of the barristers at the Bankruptcy Court, Central Criminal Court, &c. in accepting briefs from non-professional persons, ought to be specially noticed.

Several solicitors are waiting to see if you intend to take the matter up.

I am, Sir, yours, &c.
A CITY ATTORNEY.

26th of August, 1845.

It is nearly twelve months since similar conduct on the part of Messrs. CROUCH, PYKE, and others, was severely commented upon in this journal; and we certainly had hoped that, after the emphatic censure pronounced upon this most indecorous and pernicious practice by the Common Serjeant, and the repeated exposures and denunciations it received at our hands, the custom would thereafter have been repudiated and abandoned. It appears, however, that such has not been the case, that the practice is still continued, though, we hear, less openly than before.

The readiness we have always shewn to expose malpractices and breaches of etiquette committed in either branch of the Profession (to which every volume of this journal bears frequent testimony), ought to be an assurance to our correspondent that an impropriety such as he alludes to, if made known to us, will neither be connived at nor overpassed in silence. We only require to be furnished with facts—with clear evidence which shall saddle this misconduct on any one, and we will hold him up fearlessly to the reprobation of the Profession.

The following circular, which has been forwarded to us, is in direct violation of the rules of strict professional conduct, therefore we give it a place among the exceptionable addresses we consider it our duty to reprehend:—

Windy Bank, Colne, 9th July, 1845.

SIR,—Having taken the offices and succeeded to the practice of the late James Baldwin, Esqr., Solicitor, and finding your name amongst the number of his clients, I beg leave to solicit the continuance of your business at my office, and hope, by unremitting attention to your interests, to merit your confidence.—I address you by the permission and recommendation of Mr. Baldwin's executors.

I am, Sir, yours obediently,
GEO. JONES.

LAW TIMES EDITION OF IMPORTANT STATUTES.

Mr. ALLNUTT'S edition of the Real Property Statutes of Session 8 Victoria, with Introduction, Copious Notes, Forms, and Index, is now ready.

No. XI.

A foreign manufacturer has the right of taking proceedings for damages, before the French courts, against natives who have pirated his name and have attached it to goods fabricated by them, although he may not have been authorized to enjoy the civil rights of France, and although no treaty exists between France and the country to which he belongs, permitting the manufacturers of both nations reciprocally to exercise their rights for injuries occasioned them by the piracy of their names.

For the third time I return to this subject, (a) but its importance must be my apology; and I now send you the exact judgment, such as it was given by the Cour Royale of Rouen, and its reasons seem to me so admirable, that I doubt if the Cour de Cassation could annul it were the case again to be brought before that tribunal.

Your readers may remember that Rowland and Son, inventors of the Macassar Oil, had, in 1839, summoned Messrs. Gueland and others before the Tribunal of Commerce of the Seine for the piracy of their name, marks, and labels, which the French perfumers had affixed to bottles of Macassar Oil manufactured by them in Paris. The house of Rowland demanded 10,000f. damages, which was granted by the Commercial Court of the Seine, and confirmed by a decree of the Cour Royale of Paris, given the 30th November, 1840.

An appeal having been lodged against this judgment, the Court of Cassation annulled it, August 14, 1844, referring the case to the Cour Royale of Rouen.

The judgment of this Court is as follows:—

The COURT.—Inasmuch as the object of the action brought before the French courts by Rowland and Son, foreigners, and their grantees, is to claim damages for reparation of injury occasioned them by the piracy of their name and signature affixed by French manufacturers on French manufactured goods, similar to the goods manufactured in England and exported by the plaintiffs.

Inasmuch as Rowland and Son have not been admitted by the king's authority to the enjoyment of the civil rights of France, and that no treaty between France and England reciprocally admits the manufacturers of the two countries to exercise in both their rights against the piracy of their names and signatures.

That accordingly, suitably to Art. 11 & 13 of the Civil Code, the action of Rowland and Son cannot be admitted unless it is merely considered as a simple civil right.

That although foreigners may be excluded from civil rights the creations only of French laws, they ought nevertheless to enjoy rights which have their source from natural rights or the law of nations, which is recognized, and the exercise of which is regulated by the French laws.

Inasmuch as one of the first precepts of natural equity is, that any damage occasioned to others, requires a reparation from the person who has caused it.

That if this principle is positively consecrated by the French laws, they did not create it, they have only proclaimed and sanctioned it, and that consequently, although comprehended in our civil laws, it retains, nevertheless, its primitive character, which renders it applicable at all times and in all countries to the foreigner as well as to the denizen.

Inasmuch as this maxim of natural equity cannot be annulled, because in the case it is a question of damage caused by the piracy of a name and of its use on manufactured goods, the possession of which could only be established and regulated by the civil law.

Accordingly, that inasmuch as the respect due to the property of others is not an obligation derived from civil rights, but from natural rights or the law of nations; that the property of a manufacturer's name may be of a grand value; that, at all events, no one has a right to injure it; that this property, the most personal of any which can belong to man, is not created by the civil law, and is independent of it.

That if the French laws intervene to protect this property from injuries which may be directed against it, they do not alter its nature by recognizing and defending it, for they only lend their support to a property which is founded on the law of nations recognized by all civilized countries.

Inasmuch as none of the special laws appealed to in the case have formed an exception to the general principles just laid down.

Adopting, moreover, the reasons which decided the first judges.

Confirms. N. TREITT,
Avocat à la Cour Royale.(b)

New Books.

The Doctrine and Practice of Equity, or a concise Outline of Proceedings in the High Court of Chancery. By GEORGE GOLDSMITH, Esq. A.M., of the Middle Temple, Barrister-at-law. Third edition. London, 1845. Benning and Co.

WE noticed this useful work at some length on the appearance of the second edition. The speedy call for a third is the best proof that can be given that it has found that most unquestionable of testimonials, a crowd of purchasers. This new edition is considerably enlarged and improved, and has the great advantage of being adapted to the altered practice of the new orders. It is a book for the student as well as for the practitioner.

The Registration of Electors Act, incorporating the unrepealed portions of the Reform Act and other Election Statutes, with Introduction, Index, and Notes of all the Cases, decided upon appeal to the Common Pleas. By EDWARD W. COX, Esq. Barrister-at-law. The Fourth edition. London, 1845. Crockford.

THREE large editions having been exhausted, advantage was taken of the call for a fourth to introduce in their proper places notes of all the points decided by the Court of Common Pleas upon the appeals from the decisions of the revising barristers. The peculiar feature of this publication, and to which it is probably indebted for its large circulation, is the plan adopted by the editor of incorporating with the Registration Act the unrepealed portions of the Reform Act; thus practically carrying out the enactment of the former that the latter, so far as it was not expressly repealed, should be taken to be a portion of this Act, "as if it had been incorporated therewith." The new statutes are distinguished by different types, but the sections of each are arranged according to the proper order of their subject matter, under the heads of "the Registration," "the Revision," "the Franchise," and "the Election." The cases are noted in their proper places at the foot of the page, so that amid the hurry of an office or a court, the information required may be found in a moment. Such is a description of the work. Of its merits others must judge.

The New Rules and Orders in the High Court of Chancery. With Practical Notes and copious Index. By G. S. ALLNUTT, Esq. Barrister-at-Law. London, 1845. Crockford.

THE Orders come into operation at the beginning of next Term. It is, therefore, of great importance that every practitioner should, before that time, well acquaint himself with their provisions. The design of this edition is to aid him, as well the student, in this needful labour, for which purpose Mr. ALLNUTT has introduced a great number of notes tending to explain doubtful passages, and to exhibit the changes effected in the practice, and the points that will require the attention of the solicitor. A copious index affords ready access to any portion of the Orders and notes that may be sought in haste.

The Small Debts Act, with Introduction, Notes, and Index. By EDWARD W. COX, Esq. Barrister-at-Law. London, 1845. Crockford.

THIS is another of the Law Times' Editions of Important Statutes. It is truly observed in the Introduction, that the strictly "Small Debts" portion of the Act was originally suggested by the LAW TIMES; but it has not been much improved in its passage. It is in some respects an unjust, in many, a very defective measure, and the tacking to it of another and different measure at the latest moment, when discussion was impossible, was a proceeding so unconstitutional, and a precedent so dangerous that it cannot be too much reprobated and protested against. The proper and original design of the measure is unquestionably good, and has met with universal approval. But there will be great difficulties in its practical working, and the editor thinks that amendments will be required next session. In the meanwhile, he has sought to give the Profession and the public for present use an edition of the Act in a convenient form, with notes, and a most copious index, purposing to collect the decisions from time to time, and add them to future editions.

The other land belonging to this estate was sold by private contract before the sale.

The whole estate sold.

WASTE LAND IN THE AUSTRALIAN COLONIES.—A bill has been printed (for consideration during the recess) to amend the Act of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 36, for regulating the sale of waste land belonging to the Crown in the Australian colonies, and to make further provision for the management thereof. There are sixteen provisions in the measure. It seems that doubts have arisen whether, under the Act mentioned, her Majesty, or any person acting in the name and on behalf of her Majesty, can convey or alienate any waste lands of the Crown in any such colony by lease or demise, reserving an annual rent or payment for the same. It is by the present Bill proposed to be enacted, that the Governor of the colony may grant leases of waste land for seven years. The minerals of the land are to be reserved to the Crown. The Governor may grant short leases for felling and removing the timber on waste lands, and there are penalties prescribed against persons who shall occupy land without being duly authorized. The Act (when it is passed) is to take effect in each of the Australian colonies from and after a day to be specified by the Governor of each of the colonies in a proclamation to be issued for that purpose.

Mr. George Robins, who it may be remembered purchased Brandeston-hall, in Suffolk, purely as an investment, in June last, for 30,000 guineas, has this week been tempted, for sundry very weighty reasons, to transfer his contract to Mr. Austin, the eminent counsel. The on dits state the purchase-money at 35,000 guineas, but, we believe, it is not quite so much. The whole purchase-money will be but a few weeks' work in the next session of Parliament for the learned counsel.

THE "RAILWAY KING" OF FRANCE.—The railway king of France, the French Hudson, is an odd-looking but keen-observing individual, of the name of M'Kenzie. He is a great favourite of Louis Philippe, at whose numerous and promiscuously-attended soirées, M'Kenzie cuts a droll and conspicuous figure. If not a native of Liverpool, he was at no distant date a "navie" there, working—and no shame to him—in high-lows, ankle-deep, at the docks, in mud and clay. This gentleman, though entirely uneducated and of brusque manners, is remarkable for his practical knowledge of engineering; and it is proved by the flattering fact that M'Kenzie is consulted by the Government authorities of France, touching the practicability of the various railway lines either in progress or contemplated; and this in preference to the engineers of Paris, who have long been celebrated for their knowledge in the science or art, for it partakes of both. M'Kenzie has a partner, named Barry,

(b) The recent case of Chapple v. Purday (5 Law T. 266), upon the analogous question of the right of a foreigner to a copyright in England, affords a good example of the difference between the principles of English and French jurisprudence.—ED. LAW T.

once—he may be so still—a gentleman connected with the Manchester newspaper press. These facts are highly honourable to all parties. M'Kenzie's oddity of manner and appearance presents a curious contrast to that of the Parisians, malgré he carries all before him, whether on les Champs Elysées, where the railway shareholders, jobbers, &c. "most congregate," or in the gilded salons of the Tuileries.—Liverpool Chronicle. [The Mr. M'Kenzie named above was a considerable dock contractor for public works in this country for many years. He was the contractor for the junction dock at Hull, and other works there. Mr. J. D. Barry, who is stated to be his partner, was, subsequently to his connection with the Manchester press, editor of the Chester Chronicle.]

THE REPORTS.

Equity Courts.

VICE-CHANCELLOR OF ENGLAND'S COURT.

Monday, June 9.

MACKERELL v. FISHER.

Practice—Irregularity—New Orders of the 3rd of April, 1828.

An application being made that the defendant's answer, which had been filed after the plaintiff had served an order to amend, might be taken off the file for irregularity, refused with costs.

In this case the defendant filed his answer after the plaintiff had obtained and served an order to amend the bill, and he now moved that the answer might be taken off the file for irregularity.

Bethell and Bird, in support of the motion.—The plaintiff obtained the usual order to amend on the 7th of May, and served it on the 24th of the same month. The three weeks from the date of such service would, therefore, expire on the 14th of June. After service, however, of the order, and while the bill was, in the eye of the Court, deemed to be taken off the file, the defendant, on the 30th of May, filed his answer to the original bill. It is a rule in practice to consider every proceeding in a cause to be suspended by an order to amend. Supposing the plaintiff had issued process of contempt against the defendant, or is in a condition to demand an answer, the service of an order to amend amounts to a waiver of all such advantage he might have against the defendant. There is not, that we are aware of, any express authority upon this point; the case of Livingstone v. Cooke (9 Sim. 468) being the only one which in any respect involves the principle. There the defendant was brought up on an attachment for want of an answer; and the principal question was, whether or no the order to amend did not constitute a waiver, but the Court was of opinion that it did not; your Honour observing, that the order to amend created no obstacle to the defendant putting in his answer. The general impression, however, among the Profession, and the unanimous opinion of the Clerks of Records and Writs, is, that the dictum attributed to your Honour upon that occasion is not in accordance with the practice. The case of Price v. Webb (2 Hare, 515) went no further than to decide that the order to amend did not, before service upon the defendant, prevent a demurrer; and that it only operates from the time of such service. The old practice, as laid down in Wyatt, p. 67, is stated to have been as follows; namely, where the plaintiff has obtained an order to amend his bill, but neglected to act upon it, for the defendant to move the Court that the plaintiff might amend pursuant to such order, or that the order be discharged. Sometimes, in order to keep an injunction in force or otherwise, the plaintiff would except to the defendant's answer, and then move to amend, and that the defendant might answer the exceptions and amendments together. If, however, the plaintiff did not amend within a reasonable time, the defendant was in a position to move that the plaintiff be ordered within a certain time to amend, or that such order be discharged, and the defendant be allowed to answer the original bill. But the necessity for so doing no longer exists; for the 14th New Order, 3rd April, 1828, declares that "every order for leave to amend the bill shall contain an undertaking by the plaintiff to amend the bill within three weeks from the date of the order, and in default thereof, such order shall become void." If, therefore, the defendant be allowed, pending the three weeks, to put in his answer, this new order is of no utility whatever.

Jas. Parker, for the defendant, was not called upon by the Court.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—I will not trouble the counsel for the defendant. I distinctly remember having expressed the opinion attributed to me in the case of Livingstone v. Cooke, and it is clearly right. I can well understand this fact, namely, that where the plaintiff has obtained an order, to amend it may operate to his own disadvantage; but how it can do so against the interests of the defendant, who has no certainty that the plaintiff will ever act upon it, for the life of me I cannot comprehend.

The motion refused with costs.

Thursday, June 26.

GREEN v. BARCLAY.

Settlement—Construction—Grandchildren—Issue.

In a marriage settlement, a gift is declared after the decease of T. A. G. and E. L. and the survivor of them, to "all and every such son or sons, daughter or daughters of T. A. G. and E. L. and the children of such son and sons, daughter and daughters, in case any of them should be dead, leaving lawful issue, equally to be divided between them, share and share alike;" "and in case there should happen to be no child or children of the said T. A. G. and E. L. living at the death of either of them, or born in due time after the death of the said T. A. G. then upon trusts for the survivor, &c." T. A. G. and E. L. had three children, but they all died in the lifetime of T. A. G. and E. L.; but two of them left issue, who survived T. A. G. and E. L. Held, the limitation to the grandchildren was good, and therefore such issue took.

Under the marriage-settlement of Mr. T. Abbott Green and Elizabeth Lamport, bearing date the 12th day of January, 1782, certain real estates therein described were conveyed to trustees upon trust, to raise and invest the sum of 2,000*l.* and permit the dividends to be received in manner therein mentioned, during the lives of the said T. A. Green and E. Lamport, his intended wife, and from and immediately after the decease of the said Elizabeth Lamport and T. A. Green, and the survivor of them, then upon certain trusts for the benefit of their children, as the said Thos. A. Green should appoint in manner therein mentioned, and in default of such appointment, in trust to convey, assign, transfer, pay, and apply the said 2,000*l.* stocks, or funds and securities, and all the dividends and interest thereof, unto, between, and amongst all and every such son or sons, daughter or daughters of the said Thomas A. Green, by the said Elizabeth, his intended wife, and the children of such son or sons, daughter or daughters, in case any of them should be dead, leaving lawful issue, equally to be divided between them, share and alike; but the child or children of the said sons and daughters as should then happen to be dead should be entitled only to the share which his, her, or their father or mother would have been entitled unto if then living, equally to be divided among such children, if more than one, and if but one, then wholly to that one child. And in case there should happen to be no child or children of the said T. A. Green by the said Elizabeth, his intended wife, living at the death of either of them, or born in due time after the death of the said T. A. Green, then upon trusts for the survivor of the said T. A. Green, and Elizabeth, his intended wife, his and her executors, administrators, or assigns.

The marriage was duly solemnized, and the sum of 2,000*l.* raised and invested. There were three children of the marriage. One died without issue in the lifetime of both parents. The other two, John and Henry, married and had children; but both John and Henry died in the lifetime of their parents. Thomas A. Green, survived his wife, and died in 1844, leaving several children of John and Henry him surviving. No appointment had been made in pursuance of the powers given by the settlement; and the question was one raised between the children of John and Henry and the persons claiming under the will of T. A. Green.

Bethell and Stevens, for the legatees of T. A. Green.—According to the true construction of the settlement, the class entitled is to comprise persons, some in one position, some in another, and unless there really does exist such a class, no one can take. The class is to be composed of either sons or daughters of the testator. The Court is not now called upon to construe a will, but a deed, as in the late case of Youde v. Jones (8 Jur. 547). The words of the settlement are, "all and every such son or sons, daughter or daughters, and the children of such son and sons, daughter and daughters." Now the class to which the word "such," applies is a class which must be in existence at the death of the survivor of Thos. A. Green and Elizabeth his wife. But this class did not come into existence. Besides, the ultimate limitation, "in case there shall happen to be no child or children," settles every doubt. We submit that the ulterior limitation takes effect, and that the fund goes over in the event that has happened.

J. Parker and James, for the issue of John and Henry, were not called upon.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—I must admit there is a slight error in the use of the word "such" in that passage, where it occurs, "and the children of such son and sons, daughter and daughters, in case any of them shall be dead, leaving issue," because the word "such" there in effect is made to apply to a person who is dead at the death of the survivor. Now, this is impossible. It strikes me that the language in the first clause is quite sufficient to give to the grandchildren in the event of all the children of the marriage being dead. I certainly admit that the expression is "in case any of them shall be dead;" but one cannot say that there will be any of them dead when all of them are dead. The term "any" might, at first sight, seem to imply some, and not all; that, however, is not the necessary meaning of the words; and it seems to me rather that the true meaning of these words is to give, in the first place to the children living at the death of the survivor; and if there were some children living at the death of the survivor, and some had died before that, in such an event the children who are living and the children of the pre-deceased children would take collectively; but when there is a limitation to a class to consist of possible children, and, in a certain event, to consist of grandchildren, the gift is not less valid because some of the persons designated by the testator by possibility do not take at all if the others take, so that I feel inclined to think that, in the event that has happened, it was a good limitation to the grandchildren; that is, to the children of John and the children of Henry living at a certain time. Here, therefore, there is a complete gift to them, and the only question remains upon a proper construction of this instrument, namely, whether that which constitutes a gift to them in an event precisely and denominated is to be void because there happens to be an evident blunder in the subsequent limitation over. I think not.

ROLLS COURT.

Monday, July 14.

WILKIN v. NAINBY.

Practice—Order of course—Irregularity.

It is irregular to obtain an order of course, without stating every thing which is material to be considered in reference to it, and accordingly, where a defendant in contempt for want of an answer filed a plea, and thereupon applied for the common order to clear his contempt, but did not state that he had been served with a notice of motion to take the plea off the file, but which notice of motion was ineffectual because of its being served at an improper time, the common order was discharged for irregularity.

In this case the defendant had obtained two months to answer, which expired on the 27th of March. On the 11th of April an attachment issued, and on the 24th a habeas corpus, on which the defendant was brought up on the 1st of May, and turned over to the Queen's Prison. On the 12th of June the defendant filed a plea to the plaintiff's bill, and on the 19th the plaintiff gave notice of motion to take the plea off the file; but the notice was served at half-past eight o'clock on Thursday evening for the following Monday. On the 20th of June, the defendant treating the plaintiff's notice of motion as a nullity, because of the irregularity of service, gave notice of an application to be discharged from his contempt on payment of costs, and obtained an order of course for that purpose without, stating in his petition the fact of the service of the plaintiff's notice of motion.

Terrell now moved to discharge for irregularity the common order so obtained by the defendant, on the ground, in the first place, of the suppression of the fact of the plaintiff's notice of motion; secondly, it was not regular to file a plea without first paying the costs of the contempt; and thirdly, the plea could not be filed by the defendant, in the stage of the contempt he then was, without leave of the Court. [The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—What have I to do with any thing but the mere irregularity in obtaining the order? I will listen to nothing else.] Well, then, I fall back on the first, and will not rely on the other objections.

Craig, contrà.

The MASTER of the ROLLS.—On motions to discharge the common order for irregularity, I take into consideration all matters respecting the mere irregularity itself, and I consider it is irregular to omit any fact which ought to be stated in reference to the order at the time it is obtained. In this case the notice which had been served on the defendant ought to have been communicated to the officer, and if so, the order would not have been obtained. The reason for requiring a full statement of every particular is obvious, for no one is allowed to be a judge in his own case, as to what he should state, or what he should suppress; he must state every thing fully. The defendant in this case had no right to treat the motion as a nullity, but he ought to have stated it in his petition when he applied for the order. On the ground of his suppression of that fact, which was material to be known, I grant the motion.

Re BENNETT.

Taxation by third parties—Payment of bill—Special circumstances—Allegations of overcharges not specific—Stat. 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, ss. 39, 41.

A petition presented within the year by parties interested in a trust fund, to tax a bill of costs paid by their trustees, alleging generally erroneous and extravagant items, but not stating any specific items or other special circumstances (though specific overcharges were verified by affidavits), will be dismissed.

This was a petition by parties beneficially interested in a trust fund, for the taxation under section 39, of the Solicitor's Act, of the bill of costs of Mr. Bennett, the solicitor employed by the trustees. The trustees had paid the bill in or about February last and the application was therefore made within the time allowed by sect. 41 of the Act, but no special circumstances were alleged in the petition, nor were there any specific items of erroneous or extravagant charges stated in it, but only general allegations to that effect. It appeared, however, by the affidavits that in a suit for discovery, which had been instituted against the trustees, the costs as between plaintiff and defendant had been taxed, and the Master had disallowed several items (inter alia a charge for preparing receipts for legatees under the will amounting to 26*l.* 3s. 4d.); but these very items the solicitor had inserted in another bill, which he sent in, and which the trustees paid, and this last bill was that of which taxation was now sought. Another charge of 16 guineas for sending up from the country the trustees' answer in the suit was complained of.

Bird, for the petition, being asked by the Court what was the ground of the application, said, no special circumstances were alleged; but he contended that it was not necessary for a party applying for taxation of a bill of costs, paid by trustees, to prove special circumstances. There are, however, in this case improper charges. [The MASTER of the ROLLS.—Which are they; have you alleged them?] No, but we have verified them by affidavits. [The MASTER of the ROLLS.—It will not do; read the Act, what says it?] The reason why it is necessary to allege and prove special circumstances is because payment of a bill is proof of its being correct, and therefore there must be special circumstances alleged to remove that presumption. At all events, as the practice under the Act is not certain, allow us to amend and state the special circumstances.

The MASTER of the ROLLS.—The argument is, that a solicitor who gets payment is not to be protected, but that third parties may open the bill if they think proper. But a solicitor is not to be exposed to any such annoyance, and therefore it is said that payment of a bill shall not preclude taxation if the judge before whom the application is made shall consider that there are special circumstances justifying an order for taxation; and this applies to all bills, whether paid by trustees or not. Now there are several circumstances which may be treated as special; one is where, upon payment of the bill, you state distinctly what is objected to; but here there is only a statement that there are overcharges, but nothing specific. Another instance occurs sometimes in paying off a mortgage, when the attorney of the mortgagee produces his bill and says, pay me now, or go about your business; that is a special circumstance. But, without a special circumstance, I cannot order the bill to be opened. I will dismiss the petition with costs, but without prejudice to another petition being presented, if the parties should be advised so to do.

Re WATTS.

Practice—Taxation—Interest on sum taxed off.

If, after payment, a solicitor's bill be referred for taxation, and more than one-sixth is taxed off, interest will not be allowed on the sum so taxed off, and to be refunded by the solicitor.

This was an application for a reference to tax the costs of taxation of certain bills of costs of Mr. Watts, and also the costs of this application; and for an order directing Mr. Watts to pay interest on the sum taxed off his bills, as well as to refund it, the bills having been satisfied. The Taxing Master had made his certificate on the 26th of May last, and it appeared that he had taxed off 76*l.* 14s. 11d. the bills referred to him for taxation amounting to 393*l.* 10s. 10d. and therefore more than one-fifth was taxed off.

Kindersley, for the petition, said the only point of importance was the interest.

Elmslie, contrà.—There had been five bills of costs for business done by Mr. Watts for a firm of ten persons, of whom the petitioner was one. There had been two fiats taken out, one against some of the partners, and the other against the remainder. The first two bills were for business done in respect of these fiats; the third for proceedings after the fiats; the fourth was for a mortgage transaction; and the fifth was for business done in reference to an arrangement subsequent to the fiat. In the mortgage transaction there was only one item taxed off. Mr. Watts had carried in a claim to be allowed sums omitted. The costs of this application, at all events, ought not to be given.

The MASTER of the ROLLS made the order as prayed, with the exception of payment of interest.*

VICE-CHANCELLOR KNIGHT BRUCE'S COURT.

July 17 and 24.

TWINING v. POWELL.

Will—Construction—Ademption.

A testatrix gave to A for life her "house at C, and all therein," and, after her death, gave "the house, &c. &c. to D."

Held, that all that was in the house at the testatrix's death passed to A for life, and afterwards to D.

A testatrix by her will gave to A B, an adopted child, 10,000*l. and directed that if A B should leave no children at her death, the property so left to her should be given in charity. After the date of the will the testatrix transferred* 12,000*l. stock into the joint names of herself and A B.*

Held, that the legacy was adeemed or satisfied, and that it fell into the residue absolutely.

Elizabeth Welch, by her will, dated the 6th of October, 1841, after giving certain pecuniary legacies and appointing executors, gave "to her dear adopted child Lydia Mosse, if residing with her at her death or not permanently absent, 10,000*l.* money, the house in Camden-place, and all therein, to hold for her life;" and at her death the testatrix "gave and bequeathed the house, &c. &c. to her nephew and godson, Richard Twining, and his heirs." The testatrix gave several legacies to specified charities, and then proceeded, "To all the rest of my real and personal property, to my brother and niece, James and Mary Powell; and should Lydia Mosse or Mary Powell leave no children at their death, I wish the property I have so left to be given in charity." The testatrix died in 1843, and the will was proved by the executors. After the date of the will, the testatrix, at different times, purchased sums of stock, and had them transferred into the names of herself and Lydia Mosse, and at the time of her death the sums standing in the joint names amounted to 12,000*l.* The first question which arose was, whether the legacy of 10,000*l.* given to Lydia Mosse, was adeemed, and as to the consequence of such ademption. At the time of the testatrix's death, there were various articles of furniture, books, &c. of considerable value in the house at Camden-place, and a question was raised whether the terms "&c. &c." in the gift over of the house carried such articles and books. Another question was upon the effect of the residuary devise and bequest as to "charity."

Wigram and C. Hall, for the plaintiff.

Russell and Toller, for Miss Powell, who was the representative of James Powell.

Simpkinson, Swanston, Temple, Haldane, Wray, and Hood, for other parties.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said that he was of opinion that it was perfectly clear, upon the construction of the words "the house, &c." that they meant the house in Camden-place and all therein.

July 24. The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—In this case I have already stated my opinion during the argument, that the residuary personal estate of the testatrix belongs to Miss Powell absolutely, either in her own right, or both in her own right and that of Mr. James Powell, whose personal representative she is, subject to this, that a moiety of it, so far as it is capable of being given for charitable purposes, will, in the event of Miss Powell dying without leaving children, be applicable for charitable purposes, and subject to the question relating to the 10,000*l.* of which I am now to dispose. The claim of the Attorney-General in respect of the 10,000*l.* is one which created some difficulty in my mind. I have stated my opinion as to Miss Mosse, that the legacy was adeemed or satisfied, and that Miss Mosse, surviving the testatrix, was intended by her to become, and accordingly is absolutely entitled to the stock, by means of which it was adeemed or satisfied. The question is, whether the stock, being exempt from any provision in favour of charitable purposes, and Miss Mosse being dispossessed of the interest claimed under the will as to 10,000*l.* there is still an effectual testamentary provision in favour of charity as to that sum, in the possible event of her dying without leaving a child, as I think there would have been had there been no ademption or satisfaction. This question appeared to me one of some embarrassment; but I have come to the conclusion that the testatrix cannot be held to have intended that, in the event of the legacy of 10,000*l.* being in her lifetime adeemed or satisfied (she having placed herself before the will, and considered herself at the date of the will, as in loco parentis towards Miss Mosse), it should not be held as extinguished for every purpose, and as falling into the residue. I think I decide in conformity with the intentions of the testatrix, and that I am not contravening any rule of law when I say, that the legacy of 10,000*l.* as a legacy, is extinguished, and has fallen into the residue.

Declare that Miss Mosse is entitled for her life to the house in Camden-place, and to the furniture and household effects therein at the time of the death of the testatrix; that Miss Powell is entitled to the residuary personal estate of the testatrix absolutely, and that in the event of her death without leaving a child, one moiety of the residuary estate will from that time be applicable to charitable purposes.

Declare that the legacy of 10,000*l. is to be considered as extinguished and fallen into the residue.*

The charity will have an interest in it as to a moiety, because it is part of the residue.

Railway Act—Costs.

Where purchase-money had been paid into court under a Railway Act (which in such case provided that the costs of a purchase of other lands, and of the petition to obtain such purchase, should be paid by the company), and the trustee and cestuis que trust of the land joined in a petition for the payment out of court of part of the purchase-money, and the investment in stock of the remainder, it was held that the provision of the Act as to costs did not apply to the costs of such a petition.

This was a petition under the Liverpool and Manchester Railway Act (7 Geo. 4, c. 49), for the payment out of court of a portion, and the investment in the purchase of stock of the remainder, of a sum of money paid into court by the railway company, under the 61st section of the above Act. The petitioners were the trustee and the cestuis que trust, under the will of David Ellison, who were entitled in equal fourth parts to the land, the purchase-money for which had been so paid by the company, and the petition prayed the payment of three of the fourth parts to the persons entitled to them, and the investment in the purchase of stock of the remaining fourth part, for the benefit of the other cestui que trust. By the 66th section of the above Act it is enacted that where, by reason of any disability or incapacity of the person or persons, or corporation entitled to any lands, tenements, or hereditaments to be taken, purchased, or used under the authority of this Act, the purchase-money for the same shall be required to be paid into the Bank of England, or to be applied in the purchase of other lands, tenements, or hereditaments, to be settled to the like uses, in pursuance of this Act, it shall be lawful for the said Court to order the expenses of all purchases from time to time to be made in pursuance of the said Act, or so much of the said expenses as the said Court should deem reasonable, together with the necessary costs and charges of obtaining such order, to be paid by the said company." As this petition prayed that the costs should be paid by the company, Follett, on behalf of the company, submitted that, under the terms of the Act, the costs of such a petition as this ought not to be borne by the company, and cited Ex parte Cook (7 Jurist, 639).

C. Barber, for the petitioners, cited Ex parte Trafford (2 Y. & C. Exch. Ca. 522); Ex parte Northwick (1 Y. & C. Exch. Ca. 166); Ex parte Bishop of Durham (3 Y. & C. Exch. Ca. 690); Ex parte Bishop of Ely (3 Y. & C. Exch. Ca. 691 n.); Re Isaac (4 Myl. & Cr. 11); and Ex parte Madden (9 Jurist, 74).

July 31. The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—The only point reserved upon this case was as to the costs. Upon the moral portion of the case merely, the railway company seem to me the parties that ought wholly to bear them; nor am I sure that, had the decisions bearing on the question which have taken place in courts of equity not taken place, were precedents out of the way, I should not have thought it judicially right so to deal with the question. On this point, however, I give no opinion, for I should, as it appears to me, be acting inconsistently with the letter and spirit of a series of decisions that have been pronounced in this court, were I to order the company to pay the petitioner's costs of the petition, upon the ground of those cases, from which (without saying or intimating whether in their absence I should or should not have come to the same conclusion) I think that I ought not to depart. I give no costs on either side, either as to so much of the petition as seeks to have a portion of the money in question paid out of court, or as to so much of it as seeks to have a portion of the money invested in the purchase of bank annuities.

BELLING v. ELLISE.
Will—Construction—Servants.
Under a general bequest to servants, a farm bailiff was held to be entitled.

This was a suit instituted by the plaintiff, who had been a farm bailiff of the home farm at Holkam, belonging to the late Earl of Leicester, for the payment of the amount of one year's wages, which it was alleged was given to the plaintiff, by the late earl's will. By that will the earl bequeathed to each of his servants who had lived with him for five years a twelvemonth's wages. The plaintiff had held the situation for a period of twenty-eight years, and received a salary for his services of 350*l.* per annum. He had no interest in the farm beyond his salary, and he had been in the habit of receiving pupils in farming. The executors opposed the claim, on the ground of the plaintiff's not being within the designation of a servant.

Swanston and Pitman for the plaintiff, cited Chilcot v. Bramley (12 Ves. 114); and Townshend v. Windham (2 Vern. 546).

Russell and J. Bailey, for the executors.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—It is perfectly clear that this servant was a servant of Lord Leicester, living with him at the time of his death and having lived with him for five years before his death. He is therefore entitled to his year's wages of 350*l.* and interest at four per cent. from the time when the legacy is directed by the will to be paid.

GRISSALL v. STELFOX.
Practice—Presumption of death.
A reference having been made to the Master to inquire whether a certain person was dead, the Master, after finding certain facts shewing that nothing had been heard of the person for nine years and upwards, reported that he was unable to state whether the person was living or dead, and the Court, upon reading the evidence, considered that the death must be presumed.

By a decree made in the suit it was referred to the Master to inquire, amongst other things, whether a William Stelfox was living or dead, and if dead, when he died. The Master found that Stelfox had been a person of very dissolute and profligate habits, and that he was in the habit of associating with gypsies and vagrants, and that for some years previous to the year 1832, he had deserted his family, and abandoned his home, and led a wandering and unsettled life, never remaining beyond a few days in one place, and having no settled or fixed habitation. By affidavits it appeared that members of his family had, for a period of nine years and upwards, been making diligent inquiries for him, but had not heard any thing of him. Carter, one of the parties to the cause, had in July 1832, seen Stelfox, at which time Stelfox was about fifty years of age, and appeared to be in in a very weak and infirm state of health, and Stelfox on that occasion promised that he would communicate with Carter within a short time, but he had never since been heard of. The Master also found that advertisements had been inserted in several of the English and American newspapers, offering a reward for information respecting Stelfox, but no information had been obtained. Under these circumstances the Master found "that he was unable to state to the Court whether the said William Stelfox was living or dead."

C. P. Cooper and Metcalfe submitted that, under the evidence mentioned in the Master's report, the death of Stelfox might be presumed. They cited Dixon v. Dixon (2 Bro. Ch. Ca. 510); Lee v. Willock (6 Ves. 605), and Wilcock v. Purchase (a) (before the Vice-Chancellor of England, 27th June, 1845).

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—I have read the affidavits, and consider that the death may be presumed.

(Before Lord DENMAN, C. J., PATTESON, J., WILLIAMS, J., and COLERIDGE, J.)
COLLIER v. CLARKE and ANOTHER.
Replevin—A distress for rent upon a warrant signed by one who has only an equitable interest in the land, cannot be rendered valid by a ratification subsequently given by the legal owner—Payment of rent to the mortgagor.

This was an action of replevin, tried before Coleridge, J. at Chester.

Cognizance by the defendants as plaintiffs to James Hulme.

Pleas in bar:—1st. That the defendants were not bailiffs to James Hulme. 2nd. Rien in arrears. 3rd. The Statute of Limitations (3 & 4 Wm. 4, c. 27, s. 2).

Upon the trial it was proved that the distress had been levied for a fee-farm rent of 31*l.* 4s. 7d. accruing from some land in Moseley, in the county of Chester; that the legal interest of the property was in James Hulme, as heir-at-law of the mortgagee; and that the equitable interest was in one Clarke, who had devised the rents to the defendant, Clarke, and others. The heir-at-law of the mortgagee had not been in the habit of receiving payment of the rent, which had always been paid to the mortgagor; and to him, it appeared, that the last half-year's rent due from the plaintiff had been paid. The distress which gave rise to the present action was levied in October 1843. The warrant was signed by Clarke, who had no legal, but merely an equitable, interest in the land; but it was proved in evidence that, subsequently to the distress, but previously to the action, the equitable holder obtained the consent of the legal holder (James Hulme), who signed a ratification of the distress. These facts are sufficient to raise the points taken upon the two first issues; and as no decision was pronounced by the Court upon the third (as to the effect of the Statute of Limitations), it is unnecessary to enter into it.

A verdict, by consent, was entered for the plaintiff under the direction of the learned judge, at the trial, who reserved to the defendants leave to move to enter a verdict for them on all or any of the issues, as the Court above should think fit.

Jervis, Q. C. having obtained a rule, accordingly, to enter the verdict for the defendants upon all the issues,

Welsby now shewed cause.—The first issue was rightly found for the plaintiff; the facts proved did not justify this distress on the part of the defendants as bailiffs of James Hulme. The notice shewed that they did not levy the distress as his bailiffs. It was admitted that Clarke, by whom the warrant was signed, had no such interest in the land as to justify a distress by him. Would, then, the subsequent ratification by Hulme, in whom was the legal interest, give validity to the distress? Clearly not. If the defendants had, in the first instance, merely acted as the bailiffs of Hulme, but without his express authority, that authority, subsequently given, might relate back to the prior act, and justify it. But here they, in the first instance, acted in altogether a different character, and represented altogether a different interest, and they could not afterwards alter the complexion of their wrongful act by obtaining the consent of the mortgagee or of him in whom the legal interest rested. This distinction was recognised in a long list of authorities. (Guardians of the Bristol Poor v. Waite, 1 Ad. & El. 265; 1 Raym. 466; Year Book, 7 Hen. 4; 2 M. & S. 487; Godbolt, 109; Carth. 44; Bacon's Abr.; Viner's Abr. tit. "Replevin.") On the second issue also, the plaintiff was entitled to the verdict. The rent due had been paid to the mortgagor, who had always received the rent. The fact of his doing so raised the necessary presumption that he did so under the authority of the mortgagee, and was his agent for the purpose. If this were so, no rent was, in fact, in arrear. [He also contended that the third plea in bar was rightly pleaded, and that upon that issue likewise judgment must be entered for the plaintiff. He referred to Doe v. Oxenham (7 M. & W.), and Doe v. Langton (9 M. & W.), upon which the rule had been moved, as inapplicable.]

V. Williams, in support of the rule, briefly contended that though the third issue must be found for the plaintiff, that plea was bad. On the second issue, as to the arrears being satisfied, the rent due had not been paid to him who was in law entitled to it, and the verdict on that issue should be entered for the defendants. But, upon the first and main issue, were or were not these parties to be regarded as the agents of the mortgagee? If they were armed with a good defence, they would be justified if they did not set it up at the time the distress was made. They could only be regarded as the bailiffs of James Hulme, and that position justified the distress complained of. Besides, the subsequent assent carried back validity to the prior act. The ordinary rule of relation applied to this case. If it did not, the greatest difficulty would prevail in large estates, where the steward or agent was frequently called upon to distrain before the authority of the legal owner of the estate could be obtained. (Wilson v. Tremmen, 6 Scott, N. R. 894.)

Cur. adv. vult.

JUDGMENT.

The case of Collier v. Clarke was tried at Chester, in which by consent nothing was left to the jury, but a verdict was found by the direction of the learned judge for the plaintiff in replevin on all the issues, and leave was reserved to the defendants to move to enter a verdict for them on all, or any, as the Court might decide whether any cognizance was made in the name of James Hulme. The first plea in bar was, that the defendants were not his bailiffs. A distress had been made under a warrant signed by Clarke, and it was admitted that he had no such interest in the rent as would entitle him to make a distress for it; but it was proved that, subsequently, and before the action was brought, James Hulme, in whom the legal interest was, had signed a ratification; and the argument turned on the effect of the ratification. For the defendants it was argued this was a ratification to which the ordinary rule of relation applied, and the legal interest being in Hulme, the distress must be taken to be for his benefit; and the plaintiff did not deny the general rule, but its application, and we think properly. Two grounds were made for the defence; the one that the distrainer is not bound to make a ratification different from that upon which he proposes to act at the time the distress is made; and this is true, with this limitation; if a right or authority is set up as a justification, he must have been in possession up to the time the act was done. No case lays down the rule without expressing or implying this qualification. Secondly, that by a subsequent ratification, the distrainer has an authority in him at the time; but this will only apply where the authority was put forward at the time, and the act was manifestly done under it, for the ratification can only operate on the act as it was; it adopts the act as actually done by or for the benefit of him for whom it was alleged at the time it was so done; but if it does more, it changes the nature of the act, which he alleged to be done in his own right and for his own benefit, and turns it into an act alleged to be done in the right of another, since adopted. This was, in effect, decided in Trevilian v. Pyne (1 Salk. 107), where it was held that the command is traversable in replevin or trespass for taking goods, on the principle that if the defendant justifies as bailiff to J. S. in whom he lays a title to take as for a distress, there it may be material to traverse the command or authority, for though J. S. had a right to take, yet a stranger, without authority from him, had not, and must be liable. There can be no distinction as to this between the two forms of action, and the cases cited from the Year-book, 7 Hen. 4, and Godbolt, 109, are all expressly in point. A further authority has been often cited and relied upon, that of Wilson v. Tremmen (6 Scott, N. R. 894). The result is, that a party cannot fix on a right different from that which he proposes to distrain upon, unless he had the same right, or can be considered to have had it, at the time, by virtue of any subsequent consent, unless he set it up. This issue was therefore rightly found for the plaintiff. The second issue was upon rien in arrear; and no doubt the jury would be fully justified in finding this also for the plaintiff. It appeared that Hulme, the legal owner and heir-at-law of the mortgagee, had not interfered by receiving payment of the rent, which had been always paid to the mortgagor. The jury would have been bound, under all the circumstances, to presume authority for that purpose, so as to make the payment to him a payment to himself. So it was here proved that a payment had been made of the last half-year's rent, and in the usual mode. The present representatives of the mortgagor, having become interested as devisees, had quarrelled as to their proportion of the half-year's rent. Nothing, however, appears, as we think, to interfere with the effects of the payment made. The third issue it is not disputed must be found for the plaintiff. But it was objected that the plea was bad. An interpleader rule might have been applied for, but as no such motion has been made, the rule will be discharged.

Bankrupt and Insolvent Courts.

Wednesday, August 20.
(Before Mr. Commissioner HOLROYD.)
Re GIBBS, a Bankrupt.
Fraudulent bankrupt—Scrivener—Attorney.

Where a trader carried on business as a scrivener for several years after he had the means of knowing he was in a hopeless state of insolvency, receiving other men's money for investment, applying it to support an insolvent concern, and raising money at an exorbitant discount for the same purpose, and neglecting to keep proper books, Held to be such misconduct as to disentitle him from being allowed his certificate, and to come within the meaning of the term "fraudulent bankrupt."

Where a bankrupt, subsequent to his bankruptcy, received a sum of money for another party, which he paid over to him immediately, such party being at the time a debtor to the bankrupt's estate, Held that the bankrupt could not be considered as having received the money as trustee for his assignees, and was not bound to retain it for their use.

It is no reason why the Court should grant a bankrupt his certificate, that the parties supposed to be injured by his conduct do not complain; the object of withholding from a bankrupt his certificate being the suppression of fraud and other misconduct in trade, and not for the satisfaction of any particular creditors.

(a) The case of Wilcock v. Purchase, above referred to, was decided upon a petition presented by a party entitled to a fund upon the death, in the petitioner's lifetime, of a person named Wilcock, and it prayed that the fund might be transferred to her. It appeared by the affidavits filed in support of the petition, that Wilcock was last seen in 1831, standing in the market-place in Guernsey, in conversation with a stranger, since which time he had not been heard of. The pilots and fishermen, who were well acquainted with Wilcock, declared that he had never sailed from Guernsey in any of the only three vessels then lying in the harbour—that the stranger with whom Wilcock was in conversation was totally unknown to the pilots, fishermen, and inhabitants of the island, and that from that time nothing had been heard of Wilcock or the stranger. Upon this evidence the Court ordered a transfer of the fund to be made to the petitioner.

Lloyd appeared for the petition.

The fact that the bankrupt (an attorney) would also be liable to the summary jurisdiction of the superior courts for misconduct in transactions, as scrivener and attorney, is no objection to the infliction of punishment by the Court of Bankruptcy for the same transactions.

Acting both as scrivener and attorney in the same matter is highly improper.

This was an application made on behalf of the bankrupt to this Court for the allowance of his certificate.

M. Chambers appeared for the bankrupt.

James, for creditors; and

Phinn, for the assignees.

His Honour now delivered the judgment of the Court.—The trading of the bankrupt under which he seeks the benefit of the bankrupt law was that of a scrivener. In this case it is material first to consider what is the business of a scrivener. The statutory description of this class of traders is, persons using the trade or profession of a scrivener, receiving other men's moneys or estates into their trust or custody. The clearest exposition of the particular nature of this trade or business is to be found in the judgment of Lord Chief Justice Gibbs, in the case of Adams v. Malkin (3 Camp. 539):—"It appears from the old cases, that before bankers and brokers were so easy to be found, the scrivener was the person with whom people were accustomed to deposit their money, in order that he might lay it out for them when he should find a proper opportunity. The scrivener in the meantime had the use of it, and could not be questioned for the profit he made of it till he laid it out; he was trusted as a banker. It was not a specific sum which in moneys numbered he was to keep in his chest; he gave credit for it to the party who had sufficient confidence in him that he would lay it out to advantage as soon as an opportunity offered." It was seen to be of great importance that this description of persons should be subject to the bankrupt laws, for through them the property of others was exposed to the risks of trade. They were trusted with other men's property, as traders now are, and therefore it was of consequence to the public that if any calamity happened to them, there should be the same summary means which had been before devised with respect to other persons in trade, of getting at their effects, and making an equal distribution among all their creditors. But the bankrupt in this case was not only a scrivener, for with that business he united the profession of an attorney. I will now proceed to consider the charges made against the bankrupt.

The first charge is for general misconduct, in having carried on his business of a scrivener for many years after he knew, or had full means of knowing, that he was in a state of hopeless insolvency, and during that period continuing to receive the money of other persons for investment, and applying such moneys to support an insolvent concern, and for the same purpose raising money at a rate of discount which no course of trading could justify. That the bankrupt was insolvent for many years previous to his bankruptcy is clearly shewn by an extract from his books and balance-sheet, made out by the accountant on behalf of the creditors' assignees. This analysis exhibits the result of the bankrupt's trading in each year, from 1823 to 1836, between 1,300*l*. and a fraction and 10,200*l*., and during the remainder of the period, that is from 1837 to 1843, between 13,521*l*. and 38,965*l*. In each successive year of the latter period up to the time of the bankruptcy in March 1843, the amount of the bankrupt's insolvency gradually increased; for although, in the year 1840, and also in the year 1843, there appears a profit (exclusive of bad debts), the result shews a loss in 1840 of above 20,400*l*. and in 1843 of above 35,800*l*. At the time of the bankruptcy, the amount of debts owing by the bankrupt was 116,174*l*. and liabilities 81,474*l*. The assets realized are about 5,000*l*., and but little more is expected, and, after meeting the expenses of the bankruptcy, it is not probable that the dividend will exceed 1s. in the pound. Seven or eight years ago the amount of his insolvency doubled what it had been in previous years, notwithstanding the extent of the bankrupt's dealings. I think nothing more strongly marks the improvident and reckless system of the bankrupt's trading and his own low credit than his discount transactions, raising money on bills at a rate of discount which a fair and honest trader must have at once rejected as obviously calculated to involve him in inevitable ruin. The amount paid by the bankrupt for discount and interest on bills during his twenty years of trading was about 90,000*l*. and of that sum more that 78,000*l*. was paid during the last seven years. In each of the years 1839, 1840, 1841, and 1842, the sum paid for discount was above 12,000*l*.; in 1842 it was close upon 15,000*l*. The rate of discount paid for very considerable sums during that time realized between 25 and 60 per cent. per annum, and most of the money obtained on the discount of bills was for the bankrupt's own purposes. To give one or two instances of the money raised by discount in January and February 1843, the two months previous to the bankruptcy, bills were discounted with a Mr. Rutledge, a law stationer, and formerly a clerk of the bankrupt's, amounting to 8,762*l*. at a discount of 60 per cent. per annum; between November 1842 and July 1843, Mr. Ford discounted bills to 9,844*l*. at 25 per cent. per annum. Bills were also discounted by Smith at 40 per cent. per annum, out of which he allowed the bankrupt 8 per cent. Whitcombe's proof was on bills discounted for above 16,000*l*, at 40 and 46 per cent. per annum.

Then as to the misuse and misappropriation of money intrusted to the bankrupt for investment, I think the specific charges for this conduct established against the bankrupt, leave no doubt on the mind of such misappropriation of moneys. [His Honour then, after adverting to the case of Goddard, and several other cases, in all of which he considered that the misuse and misappropriation of money by the bankrupt had been established, and also to the case of Youle, in which his Honour remarked that the suggestio falsi and the suppressio veri were manifest throughout the whole of the bankrupt's letter to that gentleman, said], There were some further cases adduced, in which I think it may be said that money was raised by the bankrupt nominally for other parties, but in truth for his own use; I refer to the transactions with Mr. Trevanion and Lord Kensington. There are other objections which applied to the conduct of the bankrupt since his bankruptcy, in having received a sum of money (about 600*l*.) for Sir W. G. Todd, which the bankrupt paid over to that gentleman. Sir W. Todd was a debtor to the bankrupt's estate, and under these circumstances it is said that the bankrupt ought to have retained this sum for the assignees. I think there is no weight in this objection. The bankrupt cannot, I think, be considered to have received the money as agent for the assignees. Before I conclude the case of the opposing creditors, I cannot omit to refer to the conduct of the bankrupt in the mode of keeping his books, and in entering various transactions without names to what he calls a profit and loss account—the necessity thereby of a supplemental set of books after the bankruptcy—the various mis-entries in the cash-book, of the destruction of the yearly balance account, and of some papers relating to Pine's account, and the omission to keep a bills receivable book, and the not having taken or failing to preserve vouchers for many important items in his accounts; and it must be remembered, and more particularly in conection with the mode of book-keeping and want of vouchers, that this is a second bankruptcy of this trader. [illegible] now make a few observations upon the address of the of the learned counsel for the bankrupt. It was urged on the part of the bankrupt that the parties who were said to be injured by his conduct did not complain or appear against him. If the judgment on the question of certificate were for the satisfaction of those individual creditors, this argument might avail something; but the object of witholding or suspending the certificate is the suppression of fraud and other misconduct in trade. The end of punishment is amendment and example; with this view any creditor may lay open the conduct of the bankrupt as a trader towards others as well as himself; and a case may be established against a bankrupt either by the evidence of the parties concerned, or through the examination of the bankrupt himself, or by his books, letters, and accounts. It was also strongly urged by the learned counsel for the bankrupt, that many of the objections made to the allowance of the certificate related to matters in which the bankrupt was acting as an attorney, and for which, if in fault, he was amenable to another tribunal. I think this argument has more of plausibility than weight; much may be done by an attorney which is within the province of the business of a scrivener; but in this inquiry all business which might have been transacted by a scrivener must be considered as performed by the bankrupt in that character. It is necessary, therefore, again to advert to some of the duties of a scrivener. Now it is a most essential part of the business of a scrivener to negotiate loans between borrower and lender, and he is also the depositary of the money of either persons who come to him, not simply in his character of attorney, but as a money agent. He is intrusted with the money of other persons, to lay it out generally at his own discretion. (See 3 Mar. & Gr. 56; Lott v. Melville and Holls, N. P. R. 509; Hutchinson v. Gascoigne, per Wood, B.) A scrivener, then, who combines with that business the profession of an attorney, cannot, on becoming bankrupt, divest himself of the obligations arising from the trust reposed in him as a scrivener. By virtue of his character of attorney, he may draw the necessary deeds and conveyances, and the investigation of titles may more properly come within his duty in that profession; but having as a scrivener to lay out the money of other persons at his discretion, the circumstance of his being the attorney also, so far from exonerating him from any responsibility, makes it the more inexcusable if he has laid out, without due care and caution, any money intrusted to him for investment; for in transactions where the same person is both the scrivener and the attorney, the scrivener does not trust to the representations of a third person, but before he parts with any money left in his hands he has within himself the knowledge, or full means of knowledge, of the attorney to guide his discretion in making the investment. To allow such a person, upon becoming bankrupt, to shift any part of the duty belonging to the character of a scrivener to his character of an attorney, would be transgressing a principle of law that an offender shall not be permitted to apportion his own wrong. I may here add that in the present case the extreme impropriety of acting as attorney and scrivener in the same matters has been fully exemplified. Attorneys who also exercise the calling of scriveners should bear in mind the remark of Lord Eldon in Ex parte Malkin (2 V. & B. 31). His lordship said, "I very much doubt whether the policy of the law will allow a person to be both attorney and scrivener in the same transaction." It was further argued for the bankrupt, that the parties who dealt with him must have known that the nature of his business was the same as under the former firm of Howard and Gibbs, and that it was a perilous business; that Mr. Goddard and others must have known that they adventured their money upon dangerous speculations, and that there was greater risk than on ordinary occasions; as to this, I think there are no grounds to justify the conclusion, that any parties intrusted their money with the bankrupt, to be advanced upon any other than what the bankrupt assured them was good security. Then it was said by the learned counsel (Mr. Chambers), that the good conduct of the bankrupt, for a number of years, ought to weigh in his favour, as well as the circumstance of his having paid debts after his former bankruptcy, which he was not, by law, bound to pay. In his first transactions with Mr. Goddard, the bankrupt is described by that gentleman as having been most regular in his dealings; but I cannot agree that such was his conduct through a series of years. The conduct of the bankrupt as a scrivener is necessarily open to this question,—Has he exercised the best of his judgment upon the occasion that called fo rit? Reviewing the several cases adduced against the bankrupt, and the facts elicited upon his own examination, as also from his books and letters, I feel bound to say that he has not. I think the discretion vested in the bankrupt as a scrivener was governed not by rule, but by humour and his own want of money, and on many occasions wilfully abused. He appears to me to have acted for many years in his money transactions for others according to his own arbitrary will and private affection; of a discretion thus exercised, it has been laid talis discretio discretionem confundit (Rooke's case, 5 Co. 100 a); and it is not discretion cum ratione insanire (Hob. 158). Whether it be necessary or desirable that the business of a scrivener should exist at all in the present day I am not now called upon to give an opinion; but so long as it is a trade recognised by the law, I know of none in the right conducting of which the public is more deeply interested. The business of a scrivener, like that of a banker, supposes entire confidence and trust. It is a business in which confidence is unavoidable, and in which, therefore, frauds may be easily perpetrated; and upon this consideration the ends of justice require that the punishment for misconduct in such a trade should be the more severe. After a mature consideration, then, of all the circumstances of this case, being clearly of opinion that the bankrupt, by a long course of dealing, exhibiting many instances of gross misconduct and fraud, has forfeited all title to his former character for honour and integrity, and has brought himself within the definition of the term "fraudulent bankrupt," the judgment of the Court is, that the allowance of the certificate be refused. Certificate refused.

Monday, Sept. 1.

(Before Mr. Commissioner Fane.)

Ex parte Eaton, re Eaton v. Osborne.

Upon an application for a summons under 8 & 9 Vict. c. 127, the Court will receive an affidavit shewing that the judgment recovered was in reality under 20*l. although it appeared by the judgment itself to be above that sum.*

This was an application for a summons under & 9 Vict. cap. 127. In support of the application the plaintiff produced an office copy of a judgment by default in an action of debt. The sum demanded in the declaration was 51*l*. 19s. which was the aggregate of the sums mentioned in all the counts, and the judgment had been signed nominally for that amount. An affidavit made by the plaintiff's attorney was put in and read; it stated, that the sum originally sought to be recovered in the action was 6*l*. 6s. 4d. which sum had, since the judgment, been reduced, by payment, to 6*l*. 19s. 8d. That the only sum for which the plaintiff would have been entitled to issue execution against the defendant, by virtue of the judgment, was the before-mentioned sum of 16*l*. 6s. 4d. and costs.

His Honour thought the affidavit sufficient to justify him in ordering a summons to be issued. The amount for which judgment was nominally signed is mere form. The affidavit clearly shews that the amount which was sought to be recovered under the judgment was a sum not more than 20*l*. The legislature must have intended to give the Court jurisdiction in a case like the present. Summons granted.

COUNTRY COMMISSIONERS' COURTS.

NEWCASTLE-UPON-TYNE DISTRICT BANKRUPTCY COURT.

Wednesday, August 27.
(Before Mr. Commissioner ELLISON.)
DIXON v. LUNWOOD.

Parol evidence cannot be received to vary the amount in the judgment.

The defendant was summoned under the late Act, and a copy of the judgment-roll produced, upon which Cooper, for the defendant, objected that the plaintiff was not in court, which Mr. Commissioner Fonblanque had decided was requisite, and the she was immediately sent for.

Chater, for the plaintiff, then read the office copy of the judgment-roll, and stated that the action was brought to recover 12*l*. 18*s*. 9*d*. as he would prove by Mr. Dixon, the plaintiff's son and attorney in the action, and also by production of the original writ of summons.

Cooper objected to any parol evidence being adduced, especially to falsify the judgment-roll, from which it appeared a judgment had been obtained for 300*l*. which being above 20*l*. the Commissioner had no jurisdiction.

Chater replied that it was the usual practice in actions of debt to lay the damages at large nominal sums, and this judgment having been obtained by default, it was not altered to the proper sum.

The objection was argued at great length, and ultimately his Honour held the objection good, and dismissed the summons.

Ecclesiastical Courts.

PREROGATIVE COURT.

Monday, March 17.
(Before Sir H. JENNER FUST.)
BARNES v. VINCENT.

A power was reserved to A by marriage settlement to dispose of certain property by will, " SIGNED AND PUBLISHED," in the presence of two or more credible witnesses. The attestation clause of the will purported that it had been "signed and sealed," but the word " PUBLISHED*" did not appear.*

Held, not to be a sufficient execution of the power, and that parol evidence was not admissible to explain.

Sir H. JENNER FUST now delivered sentence in this case, which was an allegation propounding the will of Mrs. Ireland, the lady of the late Dean of Westminster, made under a power reserved to her by her marriage settlement, which gave her the disposal of certain property by deed or will, to be "signed and published" in the presence of two or more credible witnesses. The attestation clause of the will purported that it had been signed and sealed in the presence of the subscribed witnesses, the word "published" not appearing in the clause. The case was argued in the beginning of Hilary Term (January 16), and the learned judge now expressed his opinion that there had not been a sufficient execution of the power, and that parol evidence was not admissible. The Court had held this opinion in a similar case, that of Allen v. Bradshaw (2 Cart. 110), where he (the learned judge) had gone through all the preceding cases. Since then the case of Burdett v. Spilsbury had been decided, which was a very important authority with respect to this class of cases. In that case, however, there was no attestation clause in the will, merely the word "witness;" and the House of Lords, reversing a decision of the Exchequer Chamber, which had reversed a decision of the Court of Queen's Bench, held that the word "witness" must be taken to refer to neither act, or to all the acts, including publication, and that in such a case parol evidence was admissible to supply the deficiency. Here, however, there was an exclusion of the word "published," which was required by the power. The only case since that of Allen v. Bradshaw which seemed to go the other way was that of M'Inlay v. Sison (8 Sim. 567), in which the Vice-Chancellor of England appeared to have held that the words "signed and sealed," under the circumstances of that case, were equivalent to delivery, and as "delivered" had been held to be equivalent to "published," signing and sealing was equivalent to publication. But as this decision, though brought to the attention of the judges who gave their opinion in Burdett v. Spilsbury, in the House of Lords, had not been noticed by any one but Mr. Baron Rolfe, who had not expressed his entire approbation of it, and as no subsequent decision had gone the same way, he (the learned judge) thought he should not be justified in departing from his former opinion, and adopting this isolated decision, in opposition to the stream of authorities. He must, therefore, reject the allegation, though it was a very unfortunate case, as the intentions of this lady would be entirely defeated.

(Before Sir JENNER FUST.)
HOOK and OTHERS v. DAVIE.

Circumstances under which a will was deemed not to have been properly understood by the testator at the time of his executing it.

Sir H. JENNER FUST delivered his sentence in this case, which related to a paper propounded as the will of Mr. D. Hook, of Great Yarmouth, who died on the 2nd of October, 1842, at the age of 77 or 78. He left a widow and two daughters, one by a former marriage, and his personal property amounted at his death to 9,000*l*. or 10,000*l*. besides a real estate of about 4,000*l*. value.* He had made a will in 1839, and another in 1841, by both of which he appeared to have made a provision for his widow by way of annuity, and for widowhood, and to have disposed of the residue equally between his two daughters, Mrs. Sego and Mrs. Jay, which was the principle he seems to have adhered to in all his testamentary declarations. In 1842 he intimated an intention to make a new will, but took no step for that purpose before the 19th of September, 1842, when he had an attack of a paralytic or apoplectic character. On the following day he recovered from this attack, but the extent of his recovery was a point upon which the witnesses differed. On that day (the 20th of September) Mr. Jay, the deceased's son-in-law, sent for a solicitor, Mr. Cory, to whom he gave instructions for a will, in which the disposition was greatly in favour of his wife (Mrs. Jay), himself, and the widow, and to the prejudice of Mrs. Sego, the other daughter. A will was drawn by Mr. Cory from those instructions, without any knowledge of the previous testamentary acts of the deceased. It was, however, read over by him to the deceased (though in the presence of Mr. and Mrs. Jay and the widow, the parties interested), approved, and executed by him. From the whole tenor of the deceased's testamentary acts; from the state of his affections towards his daughters, for whom he entertained an equal regard; from the declarations he made, down to June 1842, of his intention to make an equal distribution of his property between them, from which the contents of this paper were an entire departure; and from what had transpired since deceased's death, it was evident, in the opinion of the learned judge, that he had not understood the nature of the disposition read to him; and the learned judge observed, that had Mr. Cory taken a more correct view of his duty as a solicitor, he would not have received instructions solely from Mr. Jay, but would have had a previous communication with the deceased himself, and would have taken care that he fully understood every part of the will, and that it was so material a departure from his former disposition. He was therefore clearly of opinion that the evidence was inadequate to the support of the paper, and he pronounced against its validity. As Mr. Davie had unnecessarily entered into evidence which had occasioned considerable delay and expense, in order to prove the general incapacity of the deceased, he should not condemn the party propounding the paper in the costs, but he should order the costs of Mr. Davie, who had been admitted as contradictor, to be paid out of the estate.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

FEELY in Error v. THE QUEEN, CUMING in Error v. THE QUEEN, DALY and OTHERS in Error v. THE QUEEN.

Writs of error had been sued out in these cases also, on the ground of non-allowance of the right of challenge, as also upon various other grounds, which it is unnecessary to enumerate, as the Court pronounced no opinion upon them.

April 25*th*.—PENNEFATHER, C.J. in delivering the judgment of the Court, proceeded to say,—In the case of Meehan in error v. The Queen and two other cases, the members of the Court have frequently met to take into consideration the several arguments addressed to them by the different counsel on Tuesday last, and it is the opinion of the Court that they are in fact ruled and decided by the order of the House of Lords in Gray's case (3 Law T. 449).

The Court considers itself bound by that decision, and will therefore adopt the language of the House of Lords in that case in the judgment it is now about to pronounce; and as Gray's case has been decided by the very highest authority, and is, of course, conclusive upon all persons engaged in the administration of justice, it is unnecessary to enter any further into or review the arguments of the counsel. The Court is bound by the judgment of the House of Lords, and consequently the judgment which the Court have come to, and which I am about to read, is copied from the order in the case to which I have referred; that judgment is the decision of the Court in Meehan's case, and is also to be entered in all the other cases, namely, the cases of Reynolds, Cummings, Daly, Kennedy, and some others whose names I have not taken down. In many of these cases other questions have been raised and argued; but the Court does not think it necessary to enter upon a discussion of them, because they become of no avail, in consequence of the judgment already pronounced. One common error is apparent in them all, to which the present judgment of the Court applies, viz. the non-allowance of peremptory challenges in the cases of the several prisoners. The House of Lords have decided in Gray's case that this Court has erred in the judgment it formed relative to the right of peremptory challenge, and such being the case, and that decision being now binding upon the Court, the cases before us are all decided by the rule made and pronounced in Gray's case. The Court has therefore only in a formal manner to pronounce its opinion, which is, that "these judgments should be reversed, and that the verdicts should be set aside, vacated, and annulled, as if they never had existed."

Bourne (clerk of the Crown).—What is to be done with the prisoners, my lord?

PENNEFATHER, C.J.—Let them be remanded and sent to their respective gaols.

For the Crown, Greene, S. G. and Brewster, Q. C.

For the several prisoners, Napier, Q. C., Smyly, Rollestone, Hassard, and F. Meagher.

CAP. LXII.

An Act to make further provisions as to stock and dividends unclaimed. (July 31, 1845.)

1. When any dividends on stock have remained unclaimed for ten years, the same to be paid to the commissioners for the reduction of national debt. Payment of such dividends to claimants to be directed as in other cases.—Whereas, by an Act passed in the fifty-sixth year of the reign of his late Majesty King George the Third, intituled "An Act to authorize the transferring Stock upon which Dividends shall remain unclaimed for the Space of at least Ten years at the Bank of England, and also all Lottery Prizes or Benefits and Balances of Sums issued for paying the Principals of Stocks or Annuities which shall not have been demanded for the same period, to the Commissioners for the reduction of the National Debt," provision is made for transferring all capital stock in respect of which any annuities constituting part of the national debt are payable at the Bank of England, and upon or in respect of which the dividends shall be due and remain unclaimed for the space of ten years, and the balances of sums issued for paying the principals of stocks or annuities which shall not have been demanded for the same period, to the commissioners for the reduction of the national debt; and by the said Act provision is made for enabling parties entitled thereto to procure a re-transfer of such stock, and payment of the dividends due thereon; and it is necessary to make further provisions in relation thereto: be it therefore enacted by the Queen's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, That in every case in which any dividends or dividend accrued due on any stocks, funds, or annuities, constituting any part of the national debt, and transferrable at the Bank of England, shall not have been demanded for the period of ten years or upwards preceding the last day upon which any dividend shall have become due or payable upon or in respect of the same stocks, funds, or annuities, such dividends or dividend, and all other dividends since accrued in respect of the same stocks, funds, or annuities, shall immediately after the expiration of such period of ten years be paid to the account of the commissioners for the time being for the reduction of the national debt, and shall be by them invested in the manner directed by the said recited Act with respect to the dividends upon stocks, funds, and securities transferred to the said commissioners in the manner therein mentioned; and it shall be lawful for the governor or deputy governor for the time being of the Bank of England, or for the High Court of Chancery, to direct the payment of such dividends to any persons or person claiming to be entitled thereto, in the same manner in all respects as is by the said Act directed with respect to the stocks, funds, and securities transferred to the said commissioners as therein mentioned.

PARLIAMENTARY PAPERS.

CURED PROVISIONS AND CATTLE.—A return of cured provisions imported in the half-year, to the 5th of July, 1845, and of live cattle imported in the last three years, has been printed by order of the House of Commons, on the motion of Mr. Grogan, M.P. for Dublin city. It hence appears that the total quantity of cured provisions imported into the United Kingdom in the period above mentioned was—of salted beef, 46,347 cwt.; of salted pork, 23,860 cwt.; of hams of all kinds, 2,423 cwt.; and of bacon, 16 cwt. only. A very insignificant portion of these cured provisions was retained for home consumption, namely, 2,363 cwt. of beef, realizing a revenue (in the shape of duty) amounting to 401*l.*; 1,191 cwt. of salt pork, producing a revenue of 459*l.*; 1,349 cwt. of ham, producing a duty of 992*l.*; and 13 cwt. of bacon, yielding an amount of duty of 20*l.* The total quantities re-exported as merchandize was, of beef, 4,304 cwt.; of pork, 6,341 cwt.; and of ham, 470 cwt. The rest was taken for ships' stores, including 44,672 cwt. of salt beef (junk), 12,563 cwt. of salt pork, and 525 cwt. of ham. The greater portion of the salted beef was imported from the Cape of Good Hope, and the Hanseatic towns figure for 2,650 cwt. The larger portion of the salted pork came from the Cape of Good Hope, the Hanse Towns, and Prussia, and half of the ham from the Hanseatic towns, the rest being distributed for the most part between Hanover, Oldenburg, Holland, and the Peninsula (including both Portugal and Spain). Of live cattle and other animals there were imported into the United Kingdom in the year ended (July 5, 1845), 6,466 oxen and bulls, 2,503 cows, 118 calves, 3,969 sheep, 42 lambs, and 411 swine and hogs. In 1843-44 there were imported 1,294 oxen and bulls, 531 cows, 60 calves, 220 sheep, 12 lambs, and 322 swine and hogs. In 1842-43 there were imported 3,578 oxen and bulls, 1,193 cows, 86 calves, 757 sheep, 12 lambs, and 563 swine and hogs. From which figures it results that the importation of oxen and bulls has nearly doubled since the year 1842-43; that the import of cows has more than doubled itself during the same period; that sheep have increased from 729 to 3,969; that calves have remained steady; and that, lastly, swine and hogs have fallen off. Such are the effects of the new tariff, as illustrated by the return before us.

Trade and Navigation.—A Parliamentary paper has just been issued containing returns relative to trade and navigation for the five months ending June 5, 1845. The whole range of trade is embraced, but we have room at present for a few articles only—butter, for instance. In 1843, the quantity imported was 54,604 cwt.; in 1844, the quantity was 69,053 cwt.; in 1845, 93,433 cwt. Cheese has increased in the same proportion. The quantity of wheat imported in 1845 was 71,089 quarters—a very small amount compared with the imports of the preceding two years. Flax also fell off materially. In fruits, the imports increased more than two-fold. Silk, skins, spices, rum, and brandy also increased. Sugar imported in 1843 was 1,639,792 cwt.; in 1844, 1,286,470 cwt.; in 1845, 1,926,036 cwt.; and all for home consumption. Tobacco has doubled in the last two years. Wine has also doubled in quantity since 1843, the quantity in 1845 being 2,720,344 gallons. Cotton wool from the British possessions is also on the increase, but foreign has fallen off. Sheep's and lamb's wool has increased from 11,234,621 lb. in 1843, to 18,421,323 lb. in 1845. The exports of coffee from the British possessions in 1843 were 31,246 lb. only; in 1844, 38,802 lb.; in 1845, 263,421 lb. The declared value of exports, coal, cotton manufactures, yarn, cutlery, earthenware, hardware, linens, linen yarn, metals, salt, silk manufactures, refined sugar, sheep's wool, woollen yarn, woollen manufactures, in 1843, was 17,027,190*l*.; in 1844, 19,490,719*l*.; in 1845, 20,482,579*l*. With regard to shipping, the tonnage entered inwards in the five months ending the 5th of June, 1843, was 1,244,186; in 1844, 1,180,286; in 1845, 1,532,748. Cleared outwards, in the same periods respectively, 1,521,936, 1,412,694, 1,593,008. In the coasting trade, the tonnage entered inwards in the same periods was, including the trade with Ireland, 4,174,439, 4,326,334, 5,225,932. Cleared outwards, 4,360,984, 4,507,848, 5,393,419. The number of ships has increased in the ratio of the augmentation of the tonnage.

Tithe Commutation.—Returns of all agreements and of all awards for the commutation of tithes which have been confirmed by the tithe commissioners of England and Wales, and also of all appointments confirmed from the 1st of July, 1844, to the 1st of January, 1845, have been printed, on the motion of Mr. H. Manners Sutton, M.P. From the summary it appears that the total composition and rates in England and Wales amounted to 12,071*l*. the total rent-charges to 12,489*l*.; increase of rent-charges to 669; the decrease of rent-charges to 250*l*.; the rent-charges, for which the compositions cannot be ascertained, to 2,769*l*.; the rent-charges of the present return to 12,259*l*.; the rent-charges of former returns to 2,425,959*l*.; and the total rent-charges to 2,441,218*l*.

East-India.—Further returns have been laid before Parliament relative to the financial affairs of India. From these we find that the gross total revenue of that empire amounted in 1843-44 to the sum of 21,809,182*l*. against 21,190,259*l*. in the preceding year, and that the total net revenue, after deducting all allowances, assignments, and charges, amounted to 14,844,222*l*. in 1843-44, against 15,307,064*l* in 1842-43. The ordinary and extraordinary charges of India and its dependencies amounted to 14,844,222*l*. and the payments in England on account of the Indian territory, to 2,944,073*l*. making a grand total charge (exclusive of collection), amounting to the sum of 17,788,295*l*. against 17,765,25?l. in 1842-43, and thus leaving a net deficiency of 773,156*l*. The net deficiency in the year preceding was 1,346,011*l*.; in 1841-42, it was 1,771,603*l*.; and in 1840-41, 1,754,825*l*.; and in 1839-40, no less than 2,138,713*l*. The total cash balances in the treasuries of India, on the 30th of April, 1844, amounted to 10,944,021*l*, against 4,431,141*l*. in the Bengal Presidency; 2,287,921*l*. in the Madras Presidency; and 3,205,955*l*. in the Bombay Presidency. The total amount of registered debt on the 30th of April, 1843, was 31,934,096*l*.; and the total amount of Treasury notes, 719,372*l*. The total amount of money advanced from 1839-40 to 1844 on account of her Majesty's Government for the expenses of the expedition to China was 2,179,022*l*. The gross total value of the imports into the three Presidencies in 1842-43 amounted to 11,148,126*l*. and that of the exports to 15,517,499*l*. The imports of stores for the Government of India, not included in the reports of external and internal commerce, amounted in 1842-43 to 467,157*l*. The total amount of the home debt on the 1st of May last past, was 2,321,392*l*. bearing 3 per cent. interest per annum, with the exception of a sum of 21,792*l*. on which interest has ceased. The total amount of the Guarantee or Security Fund of the East-India Company, formed under the provisions of the 3 & 4 Wm. 4, c. 85, was, on the 30th of April last, 2,878,821*l*. The amount of capital stock in the public funds, purchased by the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt on account of the Security Fund, amounted, last May, to 188,267*l*. Consols, and 2,994,631*l*. Three per Cents. The cost of the stock so purchased was 2,878,821*l*. The total receipts of the Home Treasury of the Company from May 1, 1834, to April 30, 1845, amounted to 4,918,937*l*. and the total disbursements to 3,628,149*l*. leaving a balance in favour of the Treasury of 1,290,787*l*. The estimate for the ensuing year gives a total revenue of 5,376,788*l*. and a total expenditure of 4,372,051*l*. leaving a balance of 1,004,737*l*. in favour of the Treasury. The debts and credits in England of the Government of India on the 1st of May amounted, respectively, to 3,618,402*l*. and 2,855,982*l*. leaving an excess of debts amounting to 762,420*l*. The expense of the several establishments of the Company in England amounted, on the 1st of May last, to 115,468*l*. for 425 persons engaged.

Post in Russia.—The receipts of the Post-office department in Russia amounted in 1843 to 16,000,000f., being about 1,000,000f. more than in 1842. The expenses amounted to about 7,000,000f., so that the net produce was 9,000,000f. From the 1st of July, 1843, to the 1st of July, 1844, the number of private letters despatched from all the post-offices of Russia amounted to 9,249,000, being 600,000 more than in the preceding twelve months. In the despatches were included 7,221,000 letters, 1,812,000 letters remitting money, and 216,000 packets. The facility with which the Post-office undertakes the conveyance of money is the consequence, in a certain degree, of the want of banks or other houses of credit. In 1843, the amount of money in metallics transmitted through the post was 1,000,000,000f. In 1823, the remittances amounted to only 600,000,000f. The amount sent in 1844 is not yet ascertained, but during the first eight months there was an increase of 20 per cent. At the St. Petersburg office only the mass amounted to 260,000,000f. The government money in these remittances amounted to 650,000,000f. in the gross amount of 1843, leaving 350,000,000f. sent from private individuals. In these sums, bank notes and commercial bills and notes are not comprised. It is thus seen that the Post-office in Russia brings in about one-third of the same service in France, and that the circulation of letters is comparatively to that of this country not more than one-tenth, and consequently that it is the transmission of money that forms in Russia a large portion of the receipts. If, however, there be taken into account the great distances between the towns, the paucity of the population, and the insufficiency of the modes of communication, it will be found that the posted service in Russia is not badly organized, and that it is in general adequate to the wants of the people. In certain directions, it is true, it is more particularly instituted to meet the necessity of the Government, but trade and commerce do not fail to profit by it, and taking all things into consideration, the means of circulation answer private as well as public interests.—Constitutionnel.

INCOMES OF ARCHBISHOPRICS AND BISHOPRICS.—A return, just published by order of the House of Commons, gives the following as the net incomes of these dignitaries for 1844, the last year to which it is made up:—

Great fluctuation exists in these revenues from year to year. The lowest amount set down in any of the years over which the return extends, is in the case of the Bishop of Exeter, whose revenue last year, it will be seen, was only 341*l*. 10s. 5d. The average revenue of the see, however, exceeds 1,200*l*. per annum.

THE DUTY ON POST-HORSES.—Returns of the annual produce and gross receipts of the duty on post-horses have been published by order of the House of Commons, on the motion of Sir Robert H. Inglis, M.P. It hence appears that the gross total annual produce of the post-horse duties, according to the Excise collections, amounted, in the year 1839, to 224,374*l*.; in 1840, to 212,633*l*.; in 1841, to 196,131*l*.; in 1842, to 175,284*l*.; in 1843, to 162,202*l*.; and in 1844, to 163,160*l*. The gross total receipt of duty on post-horses in the London district, during the six months ended the 5th day of January, 1845, amounted to 7,730*l*.; and the gross receipt of the corresponding half-year, ended 5th of January, 1844, to 8,154*l*. The six months' duty on post-horses in the Excise collections on the line of the London and Birmingham Railway amounted, in the half-year ended 5th of January, 1845, to 5,325*l*. being an increase of 104*l*. on the half-year ended 5th of January, 1844, when the receipts were 5,221*l*. The six months' receipts of the post-horse duty in the eastern, south-eastern, and western parts of England amounted, in the latter half-year to 5,738*l*. 4,373*l*. and 5,620*l*. respectively, against 5,616*l*. 4,792*l*. and 5,573*l*. in the half-year ended 5th of January, 1844. The eastern parts of England include the Excise collections of Cambridge, Lynn, Norwich, and Suffolk. The south-eastern include the collections of Canterbury and Rochester; and the western parts of England, the collections of Barnstaple, Cornwall, Exeter, Plymouth, and Wellington. The total receipts of post-horse duty for the district within which the county of Kent is included, for the 12 years ending the 31st of Dec. 1842, when steam-power was first generally applied to locomotion on water, amounted from 19,540*l*. to 23,200*l*. annually. Since that period, up to the year 1836, the annual amount has fluctuated between 22,240*l*. and 17,220*l*. it having gradually declined, year after year, as steam power progressed, and thus usurped the place of horse power. In 1837 the duty in Kent was transferred to the Excise, from which further accounts are rendered up to 1844-45. The amount received on post-horses in the Kentish district was, in 1837, 19,901*l*.; in 1838, 21,256*l*.; in 1839, 20,605*l*.; in 1840, 19,686*l*.; in 1841, 18,927*l*.; in 1842, 15,447*l*.; in 1843, 13,664*l*.; and in 1844, 12,973*l*. This includes the collections of Canterbury, Rochester, and Sussex. The post-horse duty for the district within which the county of Lancaster is included (comprising Lancashire, the city of Chester, Derbyshire, Staffordshire, with the city of Lichfield and the whole of Tamworth), amounted in 1829 to 19,260*l*.; in 1830, to 18,100*l*.; and in 1831 to 18,100*l*. In the Excise collections of Manchester, Liverpool, Northwich, Halifax, and Wigan, the amount of post-horse duty was, in 1842, 10,706*l*.; in 1843, 10,258*l*.; and in 1844, 11,094*l*.

NEW CHURCHES.—The 25th annual report of the Commissioners for Building New Churches (which was presented to Parliament) has been printed. It extends to 15 pages. It appears that 343 churches have been now completed, and provision has therein been made for 402,259 persons, including 225,217 seats appropriated to the use of the poor. There are 36 churches now in the course of building, to the erection of which the commissioners have contributed pecuniary aid from the funds placed at their disposal. The commissioners state that plans for 23 churches have been approved to be built at the places mentioned in the report. Applications have been made for further church accommodation to the commissioners from 74 places, which are detailed in the annual statement.

THE LAWYER.

Summary.

WE beg to direct attention to the elaborate and valuable judgment of Mr. Commissioner HOLROYD, in the case of Gibbs, a bankrupt, which will be found among our reports of the Bankruptcy Courts in this day's number. In the midst of this saturnalia of speculation, it comes opportunely. It is satisfactory to see that, however the dictates of honesty which should direct and control the exertions for honourable gain may be forgotten or wilfully unheeded by many hitherto respectable members of society, the voice of justice is heard reading them a lesson of reproof,—of warning, that neither their temporary success, nor the frequency of the crime among men of business, will be looked upon as any palliation when the end shall come.

LEADING CASES.—No. IX.

EDWARDS v. BATES.
(8 Scott, N.R. 406.)

The count for money had and received, when inapplicable.

One of the simplest and most useful remedies which the law provides for the recovery of money due, is by the common count for "money had and received by the defendant for the use of the plaintiff;" and where, as frequently happens, the defendant, in answer to this count, pleads a set-off, and thereby seeks to establish a counter claim, which, by virtue of the statute 2 Geo. 2, c. 22, s. 13 (made perpetual by 8 Geo. 2, c. 24, s. 4), may in this manner be brought under the notice of the Court, very complicated accounts may be adjusted, and the balance, if any, really due to the plaintiff ascertained. The plea of set-off is, in fact, in the nature of a cross-action, the statute above cited enacting that where there are mutual debts between the plaintiff and defendant, "one debt may be set against the other;" and the reason for allowing this plea is clearly to avoid circuity of action, or the necessity of filing a bill in equity.

The gist of the action for money had and received has been stated by Lord Mansfield to be, "that the defendant, upon the circumstances of the case, is obliged by the ties of natural justice and equity to refund the money" sought to be recovered. (2 Burr. 1012.) "This kind of equitable action," observed his lordship, "to recover back money which ought not in justice to be kept, is very beneficial, and therefore much encouraged. It lies only for money which ex æquo et bono the defendant ought to refund;"(a) and, accordingly, where a man has actually paid what the law would not have compelled him to pay, but what in equity and conscience he ought to pay, the money so paid cannot be recovered back in an action for money had and received. Thus, where a man has paid a debt which would otherwise have been barred by the Statute of Limitations, or a debt contracted during his infancy, which in justice he ought to discharge, or where money due in point of honour and conscience, although not recoverable by any legal process, has been paid—in all these cases the action for money had and received will not lie to compel the payee to refund the amount paid, although the law would not have lent its aid to enforce payment. (Per Lord Mansfield, C. J., Bize v. Dickson (1 T. R. 286); Farmer v. Arundel (2 W. Bla. 824); judgment, Moses v. Macferlan (2 Burr. 1012).

Without attempting to enumerate, still less to consider minutely the various classes of cases in which the action for money had and received is the appropriate remedy, we propose to consider under what circumstances this action will lie where money has been paid into the hands of a trustee for a specific purpose, and also whether this count can be used where a payment has been made under the provisions of a deed entered into between the parties; and, first, it may be laid down as a general rule that an action for money had and received will not lie to recover back a sum paid upon trust for a specific purpose, unless it be shewn that the trust is closed, and that a balance remains in the hands of the trustee. In Case v. Roberts (Holt, N.P.C. 500), Burrough, J. observed as follows: "If money is paid into the hands of a trustee for a specific purpose, it cannot be recovered in an action for money had and received until that specific purpose is shewn to be at an end. The action for money had and received must not be turned into a bill in equity for the purpose of discovery. If the plaintiff shew that the specific purpose has been satisfied, that it has absorbed a certain sum only, and left a balance, such balance (the trust being closed) becomes a clear and liquidated sum, for which an action will lie at law. Whilst the matter remains in account, and is charged with the specific trust, the action for money had and received will not lie." The law thus laid down by Mr. Justice Burrough is adopted by Tindal, C.J. and Cresswell, J. in Edwards v. Bates (8 Scott, N. R. 415-418); the former very learned judge observing, that he cannot state the principle in question more concisely, correctly, and intelligibly than in the words above cited. In that case, by a deed of assignment to which the plaintiff, one B. (the plaintiff's late partner), and the defendants were parties, the plaintiff and B. assigned to the defendants a debt due to the firm upon certain trusts specified in the deed, and the defendants having received a sum of money under the deed, the plaintiff, without waiting for any performance of the trusts or settlement of accounts, sued them in debt for money had and received. It was held, however, that the action would not lie, the trust being still open, and the balance unascertained. "This," remarked Tindal, C. J. "is an action of debt for money had and received by the defendants to the use of the plaintiff. The ground upon which an action of this description is maintainable is, that the money received by the defendants is money which ex æquo et bono ought to be paid over to the plaintiff. Such is the principle upon which the action has rested from the time of Lord Mansfield. Where money has been received without consideration, or upon consideration that has failed, the recipient holds it ex æquo et bono for the plaintiff. But here, after the money has come to the hands of the defendants they have something to do with it before the plaintiff can be entitled to any portion of it; for it appears that they entered into a covenant to receive the money upon certain trusts. * * * Now this action is brought before it has been ascertained that any thing is due to the plaintiff under the trusts of this deed. * * * In truth, the plaintiff has brought this action instead of adopting the ordinary course of filing a bill in equity." In the previous case of Roper v. Holland (3 A. & E. 99), the action of debt for money had and received was likewise brought against a trustee, and was there held to be maintainable, because the defendant appeared upon the evidence to have admitted a certain balance as being in his hands to the plaintiff's use, and was consequently precluded from availing himself of his character of trustee, and thereby driving the plaintiff into equity for the recovery of the money so held by him as trustee. We may add that, where money has been paid under a contract which still remains open, the remedy must be upon the special contract, until rescinded, and the action for money had and received will not lie. (Weston v. Downes, Dougl. 23, cited 2 B. & Ad. 462; Power v. Wells, Cowp. 818, recognised per Tindal, C. J., 8 Scott, N. R. 415).

The second point on which the defendant relied in Edwards v. Bates was, that inasmuch as there was a deed between the parties, the plaintiff ought to have declared upon the deed, and could not succeed on the common count; and this objection seems also to be fatal to the maintenance of the action. In fact the learned judge (Mr. Justice Maule) at the trial nonsuited the plaintiff, on the authority of Atty v. Parish (1 N. R. 104), expressly on the ground that he ought to have sued in covenant, and that debt for use and occupation would not lie. That was an action of debt for the carriage of goods, the hire of certain vessels, and for demurrage. At the trial, the plaintiffs, after proving the carriage of the goods and the detention of their vessel, gave in evidence a charter-party, entered into between themselves and the defendants' testator, in order to fix the amount agreed upon for freight and demurrage. A verdict having been found for the plaintiffs, the defendants moved to enter a nonsuit, pursuant to leave given for that purpose, and the Court in banc made the rule absolute, on the ground that the foundation of the contract between the parties on which the action was brought was in fact the deed of charter-party, and that it would be overturning all the precedents in pleading to allow the use of the common counts in such a case, and thereby to deprive the defendants of the advantage of having profert made of the very deed which formed in truth the groundwork of the action. The decision in Atty v. Parish does not appear to have been overruled by the subsequent case of Tilson v. The Warwick Gas Light Company (4 B. & C. 962), and is certainly countenanced by the remarks of Cresswell, J. in Edwards v. Bates. In this latter case, as already intimated, the action was founded upon a deed, and the learned judge observed as follows:- "If there were a valid contract by parol between the parties, and a deed was afterwards executed, it might not follow as a necessary consequence that the plaintiff would be bound to declare upon the deed. But what simple contract is there between these parties, distinct and independent of the deed? The defendants have received the money under the provisions of a deed, by which they expressly contract for something to be done with it. Where there is an express contract between the parties, we cannot imply one; that would be contrary to the general principles of law." The same learned judge made a further remark, which is likewise worthy of consideration, in answer to the objection that the defence relied upon could not, at all events, be given in evidence under the plea of nunquam indebitatus. "If," he observed, "there had originally been a simple contract, which, it is alleged, is merged in a specialty, you may be bound to set out the deed in which the simple contract is merged. But here the production of the deed takes away the very foundation of the action: it shews that there never was such a simple contract as that which the plaintiff is relying on." (Filmer v. Burnby, 2 Scott, N. R. 689.) It seems, therefore, clear, that where money has been received by trustees under a deed, the trusts of which are still open, the action for money had and received will not lie; and this it is of some importance to bear in mind, because a party might naturally be inclined, if he could safely do so, to proceed at law rather than in equity, the former being in general a simpler and more expeditious, as well as a less expensive, course to adopt; and we may further remark, that where in such a case the action is in fact grounded upon the deed, the declaration ought to be specially framed accordingly, and that the common count in assumpsit for money had and received will not suffice.

A note of Edwards v. Bates may be made in 1 Selwyn N. P. 10th ed. 600.

THE LAW AND PRACTICE OF PROCEEDING AGAINST A TRADER-DEBTOR,

Under the Statute 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 8.

TRADER APPEARING TO SUMMONS, AND ADMITTING DEMAND, SHALL NOT PAY A TENDER, OR SECURE, OR COMPOUND FOR DEMAND, WITHIN FOURTEEN DAYS.

53. By 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122, s. 14, it is enacted, that "if any trader so summoned as aforesaid, upon his said appearance, shall sign an admission of such demand in the form aforesaid, and shall not, within fourteen days next after the filing of such admission, pay, or tender, and offer to pay, to such creditor the amount of such demand, or secure or compound for the same to the satisfaction of the creditor, every such trader shall be deemed to have committed an act of bankruptcy on the fifteenth day after the filing of such admission, provided a fiat shall issue against such trader within two months from the filing of such affidavit."

This section provides for the case of the trader-debtor's appearing to the summons, and signing an admission of his creditor's demand in the form prescribed by the statute, and enacts that, if he shall not, within fourteen days from the time of filing the admission, pay, or tender and offer to pay, to his creditor the amount of his demand, or secure or compound for the same to his creditor's satisfaction, the act of bankruptcy shall be complete upon the fifteenth day after the filing of the admission.

The fiat must issue within two months from the filing of the creditor's affidavit, as under the last section.

Under this section, the "fourteen days" which are allowed to the trader must be reckoned from the day on which he files the admission of his creditor's demand, and not from the service of the summons, as under the last section.

In Ex parte Richard Musgrove (3 M., D. & D. 387), and ———, the trader had been summoned before the Birmingham District Court of Bankruptcy, under 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122, s. 11. He appeared and admitted the debt, and the creditor, by mistake, conceiving that the fourteen days mentioned in the Act were to be reckoned from the issuing of the summons, instead of from the filing of the admission of the debt, struck a docket on the nineteenth day after the date of the summons which [was on]ly twelve days from the filing of the admission. This fiat was afterwards annulled. Held, that the existence of this fiat was such an obstruction to the payment of the petitioning creditor's debt, that if he sued out a new fiat, founded on the adm[ission and non-]pay, &c. according to the provisions of the 11th section of the statute, the Court would annul such new fiat.

If a creditor makes himself a party to his debtor's default, in paying or securing for the debt admitted, beyond the time allowed by the statute, he cannot afterwards take advantage of it as an act of bankruptcy. (Ex parte Brown, Mont. & Ch. 177; see also Ex parte Budd, 1 Mont., D. & D. 436, 5 Jur. 272.)

But in Re Lubbock (2 Law T. 500), a trader appeared to a summons issued against him under 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122, s. 11, in respect of a debt of 70*l*. The summons was heard before Sir C. F. Williams, and the trader signed and filed an admission of the demand; but, on a suggestion from the commissioner that the money should be paid out of the proceeds of some property about to be sold by the trader (the payment to be guaranteed by the purchaser), the further hearing was adjourned; but no one appearing to support the summons, it was dismissed. In the meantime, the purchaser of the property refused to guarantee the payment of the 70*l*. upon which the trader offered a judge's order to pay in a month; but at the expiration of the fourteen days from the admission, a fiat was issued on the admission, the trader not having paid or secured the debt according to the statute. The adjudication was opposed, on the ground that, as the summons had been dismissed, no further steps could be taken under it. Mr. Commissioner Merivale (without entering into the question of the summons) decided that an act of bankruptcy had been committed by the trader neglecting "to pay, or tender and offer to pay, or secure, or compound for the demand," in the manner required by the statute.

Where the petitioning creditor kept out of the way for the purpose of avoiding receiving payment of the admitted demand, and, during his absence, the debtor made a tender of the whole debt to the petitioning creditor's managing clerk, who refused to receive it, it was held, under these circumstances, that the petitioning creditor must be considered to have concerted the act of bankruptcy, and that he could not support a fiat upon it. (Ex parte Gratton, 2 M., D. & D. 401; 11 Law Journal, N. S. Bankruptcy, 10.) Semble, that where the proceedings are taken under the statute by the petitioning creditor, not for the purpose of obtaining payment of his own debt, but to compel the bankrupt to satisfy the alleged debt of a third person, the fiat cannot be supported. (Ex parte Gratton, ut supra.)

TRADER APPEARING TO SUMMONS, AND ADMITTING PART ONLY OF DEMAND, AND NOT DEPOSING TO A GOOD DEFENCE AS TO THE RESIDUE, SHALL NOT, WITHIN FOURTEEN DAYS, PAY, OR OFFER TO PAY, OR SECURE, OR COMPOUND FOR THE SUM ADMITTED, OR GIVE BOND, &c.

54. By 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122, s. 15, if any trader so summoned as aforesaid shall, upon his said appearance, sign an admission for part of such demand in the form aforesaid, and shall make a deposition in the form hereinbefore required, that he believes he has a good defence to the residue of such demand, then and in such case, if such trader, as to the sum so admitted, shall not within fourteen days next after the filing of such admission, pay, or tender and offer to pay, to such creditor the sum so admitted, and as to the residue of such demand, shall not, within fourteen days after personal service of such summons, or within such enlarged time as may be granted to him in that behalf, pay, secure, or compound for the same to the satisfaction of such creditor, or enter into a bond in such sum, and with two sufficient sureties, as such Court shall approve of, to pay such sum as shall be recovered in any action which shall have been brought, or shall thereafter be brought, for the recovery of the same, together with such costs as shall be given in such action, every such trader shall be deemed to have committed an act of bankruptcy on the fifteenth day after service of such summons, provided a fiat in bankruptcy shall issue against such trader within two months from the filing of such affidavit.

This section provides for the case in which a trader appears to the summons and admits a part of the creditor's demand, but does not make the necessary deposition that he has a good defence to the residue of such demand, and enacts that if he shall not pay, or tender and offer to pay, to his creditor the sum so admitted, or secure or compound for the same to his creditor's satisfaction, within fourteen days from filing such admission, and also, as to the residue of such demand, shall not, within fourteen days from the service of summons (or within any enlarged time which the Court may allow), pay, or secure, or compound for its payment to the creditor's satisfaction, or enter into a bond, with two sureties to be approved by the commissioner, to pay any sum which his creditor may recover against him by action for the recovery of the same, together with the costs, he shall be liable to be made a bankrupt on the fifteenth day after service of such summons.

The fourteen days under this action must be reckoned from the day of the service of the summons, and the fiat, as in the case of the two preceding acts of bankruptcy, must issue within two months from the filing of the creditor's affidavit.

55. The following is the form of the memorandum of the act of bankruptcy on trader summons:—

In the Bristol District Court of Bankruptcy.

At the Bankruptcy Court, Bristol. the day of 184

In the matter of E F, against whom a fiat, bearing date the day of , 184 , hath been issued, before Commissioner Mr. Serjeant Stephen, A B, of , and C D, of , being severally sworn and examined at the time and place above mentioned, upon their oaths say, and first this deponent A B for himself saith, that he has inspected the paper now shewn to him marked with the letter (A), remaining upon a certain file of proceedings in this court, and purporting to be a summons issued by this Court on the day of last, against the said E F, and also the paper writing now shewn to him marked with the letter (B), now remaining upon the said file, and purporting to be an affidavit sworn by him, this deponent A B, and C D, on the day of last. That he, this examinant A B, is the same creditor at whose suit such summons was issued, and that E F, the person against whom the above fiat has been issued, is the same trader-debtor against whom that summons was issued. And this examinant further saith, that at the time of the filing of the said affidavit marked with the letter (B), he, this examinant, was a creditor of the said E F, as and to the amount in that affidavit set forth, the said E F, then being, to the best of this examinant's knowledge and belief a trader within the meaning of the statutes in this behalf made and provided, and then to the best of this examinant's knowledge and belief residing in the district in and for which this Court acts. And this examinant further saith, that from thenceforth he hath continued to be, and still is, a creditor of the said E F, and to the amount aforesaid. And this examinant, the said A B, for himself further saith, that the said E F did not come before the Court at the time appointed by such summons, or make known, or prove to the satisfaction of the Court, any lawful impediment for his not appearing before such Court as required by the said summons; but that he, the said E F, has not yet paid, secured, or compounded for such demand as in the said summons mentioned, to the satisfaction of him, this examinant, or, "as he this examinant believes," entered into any bond in respect to any action brought or to be brought for the recovery of such demand, although this Court has not, as this examinant believes, granted any enlarged time in that behalf. And the said C D for himself saith, that he has inspected the paper writing now shewn to him, inserted with the letter (C), remaining upon the said file, and purporting to be an affidavit sworn by this examinant, the said C D, on the day of last, and that he is the same person in that affidavit mentioned as having served such summons, and that he did make such personal service as in that affidavit set forth.

CHAP. VII.

COSTS.

56. By 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122, s. 18, it is enacted, "That where any trader against whom an affidavit of debt is filed as aforesaid, shall be summoned to appear before the Court in which such affidavit shall be filed as the case may be, every such trader shall have such costs and charges as such Court in its discretion shall think fit.

"If a trader who has been summoned under 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122, s. 11, does not file an affidavit as directed by the said Act (vide suprà), he will not be entitled to have the summons dismissed, or be allowed the costs of appearance." (Ex parte Lawrence and Co. 5 Law T. 203 (Shepherd, Com.).)

Where a summons is dismissed on a technical ground, it is in the discretion of the Court to allow or refuse the costs of the defendant's appearance to the summons. (Ex parte Goode, 5 Law T. 133 (Shepherd, Com.).)

By 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122, s. 19, it is enacted, "That in every action brought after the commencement of this Act, wherein any such creditor is plaintiff and any such trader is defendant, and wherein the plaintiff shall not recover the amount of the sum for which he shall have filed an affidavit of debt under the provisions of this Act, such defendant shall be entitled to costs of suit, to be taxed according to the custom of the court in which such action shall have been brought, provided that it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the Court in which such action is brought, upon motion to be made in court for that purpose, and upon hearing the parties by affidavit that the plaintiff in such action had not any reasonable or probable cause for making such affidavit of debt in such amount as aforesaid; and provided such Court shall thereupon, by a rule or order of the same Court, direct that such costs shall be allowed to the defendant, and the plaintiff shall, upon such rule or order being made as aforesaid, be disabled from taking out any execution for the sum recovered in any such action, unless the same shall exceed the amount of the taxed costs of the defendant in such action; and in case the sum recovered in any such action shall be less than the amount of the costs of the defendant to be taxed as aforesaid, that then the defendant shall be entitled, after deducting the sum of money recovered by the plaintiff in such action from the amount of his costs so to be taxed as aforesaid, to take out execution for such costs in like manner as a defendant may now by law have execution for costs in other cases."

The provisions of these sections of the statute which give the trader costs if he be improperly summoned by his creditor, or if his creditor shall, in his affidavit, depose to a greater amount of debt than he afterwards recovers by action, are entirely of a new character, and cannot fail to attain the object for which they were framed, namely, that of protecting honest but unfortunate debtors from having claims made upon them by designing creditors for a greater amount of debt than is really and justly due.

Where the creditor avails himself of the double remedy of proceeding as well by action as by summoning his debtor before the Court of Bankruptcy, and the trader in consequence of the proceedings in bankruptcy, pays his creditor's demands, the trader cannot stay the proceedings in the action without at the same time paying costs. (Covington v. Hogarth, 4 Law T.)

CHAP. VIII.

GENERAL REMARKS.

Although, upon the whole, the statute 5 & 6 Vict. 122, affords to creditors more expeditious means of proceeding against their debtors than the earlier statute 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, yet it must also be admitted that the provisions of the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122, are less disadvantageous to the debtor. It may, however, be sometimes a matter worthy of consideration to creditors, to determine under which statute they should proceed against a trader-debtor residing within the district of the London Court of Bankruptcy. It is true that, under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, the amount of debt required is, in the case of a single creditor, or of two or more creditors, being partners, 100*l.*; in the case of two creditors not being partners, 150*l.*; and in the case of three or more creditors, 200*l.*; whereas, under 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122, any creditor for any amount may file his affidavit and proceed against his debtor. The time, also, under the latter statute, for paying the debt, &c. is limited to fourteen days, whereas under the former it extends to twenty-one days; yet it must also be remembered that, under the latter Act, the creditor must issue a summons calling upon his debtor to appear, to which, on his appearance, he may take technical objections, and, if he succeed in substantiating them, thereby cause considerable delay to his creditor; or the commissioner has power, upon reasonable cause being shewn, of enlarging the time for the debtor's complying with the requisitions of the summons. Under the former Act, none of these delays are likely to occur. The debtor commits an act of bankruptcy absolutely on the twenty-second day after service of the creditor's affidavit, if he does not comply with the requisitions of the statute. We would, therefore, once more urge upon creditors of traders residing within the London district the propriety of pausing to consider of which remedy they should avail themselves against such debtors.

LEGAL INTELLIGENCE.

CANVASSING FOR A JUDICIAL OFFICE.

The subjoined letter from Lord Denman to Jelinger C. Symons, esq. contradicts the rumour circulated in some of the papers, that his lordship had ever canvassed for the office of Common Serjeant. As it furthermore expresses the noble lord's opinion on the propriety of a canvass for a judicial office, the publication of it just now must be of service. We should add that the letter was in reply to one from Mr. Symons, whose articles on magisterial law in this journal have given such unmixed satisfaction, and who, being a candidate for the judgeship to the Court of Requests for the Tower Hamlets, very properly consulted his lordship on the propriety of a personal canvass for a judicial situation:—

"Middleton, Aug. 22, 1845.

"Dear Sir,—On subjects such as that on which you ask my opinion, I always feel bound to answer as explicitly as my state of knowledge permits me. My personal opinion, indeed, is clearly in accordance with yours, and I acted upon it at some hazard, to an important object, when I was a candidate for the office of Common Serjeant. It was then intimated, on the part of my excellent opponent, Baron Bolland, that he should wait on the electors (the Common Council) at the earliest opportunity. I immediately issued a printed circular, stating that I could not take that course, thinking it derogatory to one seeking a judicial station. On this Baron Bolland immediately made a public retractation in the same manner of the intention which had been announced in his name.

"I have reason, however, to believe that ... subsequent vacancies the candidates canvassed in person, and these were gentlemen of high character.

"What may have been done with respect to the office you wish for, I know not, nor have I the means of ascertaining what my brother judges hold to be right.

"I should consider it more desirable that all the candidates should agree to abstain from personal solicitation; but perhaps it has already commenced, nor can it be deemed improper, if conformable with the practice which has prevailed and the conduct of respectable members of our profession. Whether the electors would not be more likely to favour one who should decline this practice, with a clear and res... ful statement of his reasons, is a merely prudential question.—I am, dear Sir, faithfully yours, (Signed) "Denman.

"To J. C. Symons, esq. &c."

Millbank Prison.—On Thursday, the second report of the Inspectors of Millbank Prison, as presented to Parliament in pursuance of the Act 6 & 7 Vict. c. 26, was issued. The prison is now used as a depôt for prisoners until they are transported or otherwise disposed of. Since the last report, a large ward has been erected for boys who were too young to be sent to the Pentonville Prison and too old for Parkhurst, and when practicable they have the advantage of separate confinement; they are instructed in religious and moral duties, trained to industrious habits, and taught trades calculated to render them useful servants in the colonies to which they are sent. It seems that of 242 boys who have been placed in the juvenile ward during the eight months which have elapsed since its commencement, but three have received corporal punishment; a considerable number have never been reported for a single violation of the prison rules. Matrons have been appointed to convict-ships, and materials for work are now supplied to the female prisoners during the voyages. Last year 4,140 prisoners were sent from the prison, who have been sentenced to transportation. There were 3,778 males, and 362 females; of the number 685 were sent to Norfolk Island, 2,241 to Van Diemen's Land, 150 to Bermuda, 102 to the invalid hulk at Woolwich, 239 to Pentonville, 361 to Parkhurst, and the females (362) to Van Diemen's Land. The inspectors report that the prisoners in Millbank have generally enjoyed good health, the mortality among them has been small, and the number of sick at no time in the year considerable. There were seventeen deaths—a less proportion than the average of former years—and three cases of insanity, one of which was disallowed, and the convict (Dalmas) transported.

Rebuilding of the New Prison, Clerkenwell, upon the Solitary Principle.—It is understood that the demolition of the New Prison, Clerkenwell, will shortly commence, for the purpose of the erection of a new and considerably enlarged place of confinement in the county of Middlesex, on the solitary principle, after the plan of the Model Prison, at Pentonville, the magistrates of the county assembled in quarter sessions having resolved to do so on account of the great increase of late years in the number of commitments, and the crowding of the present prisons which has resulted therefrom. The period occupied by the erection of the intended new prison will, it is anticipated, be about eighteen months.

Our attention has been invited to a new Life Assurance Company (whose advertisement may be found in our columns), called "The Sovereign Life Assurance Company." The list of officers, we perceive, embraces many well-known and substantial names, and is calculated to give confidence to the public. The scheme presents some new features in Life Assurance, into which we have neither leisure nor space to justify our entering just now; we may however add, that the novelties appear to be based upon sound principles, and we see no reason why they should not equally benefit the policy-holders and the office itself.

CORRESPONDENCE.

ATTORNEYS' GOWNS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

Sir—I observed in your paper of the 23rd ult. a letter on this subject, signed "An Old Subscriber," who wishes to know what has been done in the matter, and why nothing more is said on the subject.

Being one of the first that brought the matter before the attorneys in the Law Times, I beg to inform your correspondent that I am not aware that any thing further has taken place, except what has appeared in your paper; and I suppose the reason why nothing more was said on the subject was, on account of the business of Michaelmas Term having called off the attention of the attorneys from it.

If your correspondent will refer to the Law Times of the 26th Oct. 1844, he will find the names of six gentlemen, beside myself, who highly approved of the wearing of the gown when attending Court, and who were ready to assist in carrying the same into execution.

A host of correspondents who have withheld their names, for what reason I know not, have also approved of the plan. Why do they not come forward, and give their names and assistance, as an example to their brethren? as it must have been observed by the readers of your paper that the majority of the Profession are in favour of wearing the gown, nay, I do not remember that any one has written against it, except an anonymous correspondent or two.

If "An Old Subscriber" will give his name and assistance, I should be glad to join him in again bringing the matter before the Profession (during the long vacation), with a view, if possible, to adopt some plan to get the gown universally worn by them when attending Court.

I have the names of several gentlemen, beside those mentioned in my letter before referred to, as ready to join in endeavouring to carry the matter into execution. I am, Sir, yours truly,

J. T. Shapland.

THE LOST WILLS FROM DOCTORS' COMMONS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

Sir,—I now proceed to address you in this, my third letter, inclosing further details regarding this extraordinary transaction, with additional remarks on the expensive, ill-adapted, and cobweb system still carried on in the public offices of Doctors' Commons.

This system, you are aware, has existed for many centuries with increasing accumulation of business, carried on in an official establishment, with the self-same machinery and narrow line of policy existing centuries back, the cream of the office finding its way into the pockets of the head officials, whilst the blood, bone, sinews, and nerves of the unfortunate under-workers are starved down upon slender incomes. The enormous income netted from this department, the Prerogative Registry, with its judicial addenda, realize to one family alone, it is computed, upwards of 100,000*l.* per annum; and although I myself find no fault with that family having such an enormous income out of a system so grossly wanting in its essentials for the public service, whilst many other public departments are in a similar condition, yet the nation and the public, through both branches of the Profession, must feel that it is high time a radical change should take place in the crying monopoly in this one spot, or that better services should be rendered for the enormous sums paid by the public into the civil treasury of Doctors' Commons.

It will be seen by you, Sir, and the extensive body of readers of your journal, that the above observations are not misplaced, when I inform you that they, in effect, so strongly pressed upon the minds of the leading members of both branches of the legislature, that in the year 1830, a commission of inquiry was issued to investigate this office and the other official departments in Doctors' Commons; the report, now lying before me, I see is signed by one archbishop and five bishops, with four common law and two civil judges, and by my Lord Brougham as Chancellor; but, Sir, that report is, like numerous other reports made by the Government, quietly returned, neatly bound up in pleasing blue covers, laid upon the table of both Houses of Parliament, then thrown under the table, ultimately finds its way to sundry rolls of butter, in the provision-shops of the metropolis.

The Times paper felt this to be so in the various Irish commission inquiries, and you evidently feel the same, as you have opened your columns to censure these abuses. By this means, at a comparatively small cost, a spirited editor and widely-circulated journal can effect more by the force of public opinion, wielded through his columns, than the heavy outlay drawn from the pocket of John Bull for an expensive parliamentary commission, read by no one.

Anxious not to make this letter too long, and to keep up the interest in the further disclosures I have to make, I will shortly state that the result of the commission of 1830 has ended in smoke, nothing has come of it save a costly alteration suggested by the ingenuity of the officials in Doctors' Commons to take away the simple machinery of the 300 provincial courts, thus withholding the bread now supplied to several hundred professional men, transfer it to Doctors' Commons, and there add to the already over-pampered Heads of the present much-to-be-condemned system.

Sir, so little are the sayings and doings of Doctors' Commons known to the Profession, that I think it advisable to tread slowly and safely, as I further proceed, and shall therefore again trouble you with other facts in my ensuing letters respecting the "Report" above alluded to, and upon which I intend next to treat, and shall thus continue to travel under authority.

I am, yours, &c.

THE REAL PROPERTY STATUTES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

SIR,—I beg, through your columns, to submit to the Profession the following questions, which I do not find to have been noticed in any published observations on these statutes.

Can a corporation make a valid grant without livery of seisin, for lives, of any of their freeholds? And if so, would not such a grant (now exempt from ad valorem stamp-duty) be chargeable with ad valorem stamp-duty on the amount of the fine, as on a conveyance by lease and release? (8 & 9 Vict. c. 106, s. 2.

Same statute, ss. 6 & 7.—Will it be necessary, under these sections, that a married woman should acknowledge a deed, in conformity with the provisions of the Fines and Recoveries Act, by which she passes or disclaims her interest in tenements and hereditaments of any other than freehold tenure; the general practice having hitherto been not to require such acknowledgment, when the tenements and hereditaments in which she is interested are not of freehold tenure?

8 & 9 Vict. c. 112, s. 2.—Supposing the owner of the fee to create a term by way of mortgage, and, after the day of redemption has passed, to pay off and satisfy the principal and interest, would that term, immediately on the satisfaction of principal and interest, so effectually cease and determine as to preclude the necessity of a re-conveyance by the mortgagee, and the possibility of its being legally dealt with afterwards?

8 & 9 Vict. c. 119, s. 3.—Would not a deed, made in pursuance of this Act, although it should consist of less than 2,160 words actually written on the parchment, be deemed, for the purposes of stamp duty, to comprise the general words in sec. 2, and such of the covenants in full as should correspond with the short forms used in the deed, and be chargeable with progressive duty, if the whole amount of words actually comprised in the deed, together with the words in the Act, should exceed 2,160?

The idea may, perhaps, seem absurd, but if the Legislature have expressly retained the ad valorem and progressive duty on the lease for a year, a document now no longer in existence, and which, after the 1st of October, need not be even mentioned or referred to, it is no very great stretch of imagination to suppose, that although they have given to certain short forms of words the legal operation and effect of longer ones, yet they did not intend that the adoption of the short forms should tend in any wise to diminish the amount of stamp-duty which would have been payable had the longer forms been used.

Would it be prudent to use the forms given in this statute in any case where the vendor's title is by devise or descent, inasmuch as the covenants given in the Act extend only to the rights, acts, deeds, incumbrances, &c. of the vendor himself and his heirs, and persons claiming under him and them, and not to those of his testator or ancestor, as is usual where the vendor is devisee or heir-at-law?

If there is any thing in the points to which I have referred, some observations on them from some correspondent who has turned his attention to the subject, would I think be useful to the Profession, before the Acts come into operation.

I am, yours, &c. H. B.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

SIR,—As many practitioners may rely on Denison v. Hawkes, reported in the last number of your valuable journal, as to evidence of a judgment, allow me to remind the Profession, through your columns, that the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 127, does not come into operation until the 1st day of November next.

SMALL DEBTS ACT.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

SIR,—In many instances there is no judge to the courts of request in the country, but there are commissioners who act as judges.

By sec. 9, power is given for the Queen, with the advice of her Privy Council, to enlarge the jurisdiction of any courts of request; but the section at the same time denies effect to any such order (the order of the Privy Council, I presume) in respect of any court which shall not have a judge who is either a barrister-at-law, &c. By the same section, the commissioners of the court where there shall be no judge, or the persons to whom the appointment of any judge, or, if no judge, to whom the appointment of any clerk belongs, are empowered to call a meeting three calendar months next after the making of any such order to appoint a judge.

It appears, therefore, that, according to the strict interpretation of the Act, where there are commissioners who act, and no judge, that the jurisdiction cannot be extended, and no judge can be appointed.

For they are not empowered to call a meeting till three calendar months after obtaining the order of the Privy Council; and this order is of no effect unless the court shall have a barrister or an attorney acting as judge.

Can any of your readers explain to me the real meaning of this most extraordinary clause?

Yours, &c.
A SOLICITOR.

LEGAL EDUCATION.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

SIR,—It was with great pleasure that I read in the last number of your journal, a letter signed "Virtutis," on the subject of legal education. I have a few suggestions to offer on the subject, and I send them to you, in the hope that they may find insertion in your journal, and so be brought before those persons whose duty it is to look to the education of the young men brought up to the law. I would, in the first place, make it imperative that all articled clerks, at the time of their examination, should undergo a satisfactory examination in Latin, Greek, French, History, the first four books of Euclid, and in Arithmetic; by such an examination those persons would, to a great extent, be shut out from the profession, whose minds and honour are narrowed by the want of a liberal education; secondly, I would suggest the propriety of revising the mode on which the present examinations are carried on. It is well known that the same questions are asked over and over again, so that an idle clerk may, by three months' study and perusal of the old questions, be enabled to pass his examination and get admitted without perhaps knowing a word more of law than is contained in a few questions; whilst, on the other hand, one who has read well and industriously throughout the whole term of his articles, but who has not stooped to cram with old questions, may not be able to answer nearly all the questions, and be very probably turned back, though much more fit to conduct an office and advise a client than one who only knows what he has learnt by cramming. The alteration I would suggest is to have the examination last two days instead of two hours, and that the questions should relate more to principles than they do at present; I would, moreover, suggest the propriety of classing the candidates according to the efficiency they display in answering the questions; for by such a classification the public would be benefited, the clerk obtain justice, which is, by the present mode, denied him, and the Profession brought to a standing which it ought to enjoy. I could say more on this neglected though very important subject, but that I fear I have already trespassed too much on your columns. Hoping the matter will not rest here, I am, yours, &c.

PROFESSIONAL MALPRACTICES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

SIR,—Under this head I find my name mentioned and coupled with Mr. Crouch.

I have to inform you that when at the bar I never held a brief at the Middlesex Sessions, or at the Central Criminal Court, without being regularly retained. Yours, &c.

H. H. PYKE.

87, Chancery-lane, September 1, 1845.

[We have omitted some portions of Mr. Pyke's letter, because they referred neither to us nor to the subject of his disclaimer, but needlessly alluded to the conduct of one who, when Mr. Pyke was at the Bar, was his compeer.—ED. L. T.]

To Readers and Correspondents.

W. H. (Ilsley).—The abstract suggested we have pleasure in giving. It may be found under the head of "Legislator" in this number.

J. B. (Gloucester).—We are obliged for the suggestion, which will receive consideration, and the alteration, if thought advisable, will be adopted.

R. F. A. (Honiton).—Our next number will contain some remarks on the subject.

A SOLICITOR and AN OLD STANDING MEMBER OF GRAY'S-INN.—We have neither space to devote to such a subject, nor the wish to revive a discussion which cannot have the effect of recalling the sentence on the individual alluded to, or be in any way of service in allaying the feud between the Bar and the Press.

SHORT CONVEYANCES.

WE have already noticed the alarm which has been excited in some quarters by Lord BROUGHAM'S Act for abbreviating the common Covenants in Conveyancing. The more we consider the subject, the more do the objections which at the first glance presented themselves melt into thin air. They have proceeded rather from the apprehension than the reason. The lawyers have been so vexed of late years by legislation, and still more by legislation threatened in a spirit of hostility, which has evidently proceeded more from personal spite than patriotism, that they may be excused for being a little too sensitive in imagining mischief where none is meant, more especially in a measure having an object so suspicious as the shortening of conveyances, and thus indirectly abbreviating their fees. But practically the evil is not so great as it seems. Indeed, we are inclined, after careful consideration of the measure, to deem it rather beneficial than otherwise to the Profession, as undoubtedly it is a boon to the public.

The project of Lord CAMPBELL was received by the LAW TIMES with unqualified reprobation, and the able exposure of its inconsistencies and its impracticabilities which appeared in our columns, from the pen of a conveyancer so well qualified for the task of criticism, materially aided in the signal defeat which not merely postponed but annihilated it. The recent statute, however, is altogether different in its aim and provisions. It does not pretend to pare down all conveyances to the same pattern, and to compress every complication of interests into half-a-dozen lines; it limits itself to the very rational purpose of shortening those parts in a conveyance which in practice were inserted in every deed in almost the same words, and those words tediously and needlessly multiplied according to an ancient formula, a verbosity which, if it sometimes added a few shillings to the fees, more frequently was a source of annoyance to the conveyancer, by extending his draught beyond the skin, and adding to his charge the cost of another stamp, thus swelling the apparent amount of his bill with little profit to himself.

Every practitioner knows, that in fact nothing is so difficult as to regulate the charges for conveyancing. The trouble can never be measured by the length of the deed, nor can the charge be proportioned to the work. Practically, the costs are regulated, rudely indeed, but still with some approach to the principle, by the value of the property conveyed. The actual labour of conveying a freehold of 50*l.* has been hitherto as great as for one of 5,000*l.*; but what solicitor could or would charge as much for the one as for the other? or what client would be satisfied with such an apparently unjust claim upon his purse? Yet though compelled to curtail his charges for the small conveyances, the solicitor could not curtail his work. He was obliged to insert the same verbose forms in both, and to fill half a skin of parchment to express that which, in plain English, might be as well expressed in half-a-dozen lines. Now the new statute has enabled the solicitor to do that which in such cases he was always desirous but dared not to do. It has permitted (not compelled) him in some measure to regulate his work and charges; to convey small properties by a shorter form, and consequently at less cost, than large ones. This it has effected by the simple process of enacting that the common covenants inserted in every deed shall be equally valid if expressed in a certain brief formula prescribed by the Act, as if they had been set out in the verbose form hitherto in use.

It cannot be denied that this is a great improvement, a real reform, a boon to the public, and a convenience to the Profession. But it suggests another change, which, we think, t be adopted with advantage, if made with due deliberation, not framed by inexperienced jurists, or senators playing at law-making, but by members of the Profession, whose practice would enable them to anticipate difficulties and provide for contingencies never dreamed of by the amateur reformers of our law. We throw out the suggestion for the serious consideration of our readers, whether it might not be practicable, as certainly it would be desirable, to regulate the costs of conveyancing almost if not altogether by a scale proportioned to the value of the property conveyed. In this we of course refer only to the cost of the conveyance itself, not to the investigation of title, which must vary so vastly in every case, that the application of any such scale would be an impossibility. We leave the subject in the hands of our readers for the present, hoping that it will have their attention, for the recent change must lead to others in the same direction, and it seems to us that the only method of securing justice to the solicitor as well as to the client will be to make some such arrangement as we have suggested.

A COURSE OF LECTURES ON THE LAW OF CONTRACTS,

By Professor Carey.

Delivered at the University College.

LECTURE IV.

I mentioned in the last lecture the difference between an executed contract and an executory contract. A contract is said to be executed where that which is to be done on one side is already performed, and it only remains for that which is contracted for on the other side to be also performed. The terms executed and executory are most frequently used with reference, not so much to the state of the transactions themselves, as to the form of pleading. If A agrees to change horses with B, and they do it immediately, this is termed by Blackstone an executed contract; by which he means the contract has performed its office—every thing contracted for is done, and the contract is over. This is not the sense in which an executed contract is sued upon; for though the agreement is performed on one side, it is left unperformed on the other, else no action for non-performance could be brought upon it. A contract, after it has been duly performed on both sides, has done its office—no action is likely to be brought upon it. So far it is executed. But when, in talking of contracts, it is said that one is an executed contract, it is meant that it is performed on one side, and only wants performance on the other. If A and B agree to exchange horses next week, this is termed by Blackstone, rightly, an executory contract; but he makes no reference to the case in which A delivers his horse to-day and B promises to deliver his to-morrow. Looking at the terms themselves, this might appear to be an executed contract; and so it is in a certain sense, because A has performed his part, and the consideration is executed. Strictly speaking, that is an executed contract; but you must observe, here, that the agreement is of such a nature as not to create a debt. If it had been to deliver my horse to-day, to be paid for in money a week hence, it would have been, in every sense of the term, an executed contract; and, on the expiration of the week, the money might have been recovered as a debt.

Every contract, expressly made, is in its origin executory: but when, on the performance on one side, a debt is created, the creditor sues for the debt, without being obliged to set out the terms of the original agreement. A man purchases goods for 50*l.* Then, the 50*l.* not being paid, the creditor sues him, and states that the defendant was indebted to him in 50*l.* for goods sold and delivered, without setting out the original contract; still the contract was in its origin executory, and, if no delivery of the goods had taken place according to the contract, it would have been necessary to set out that there was such a contract made, that the defendant promised to deliver the goods, and did not deliver them. Where, if a debt is not created, the party complains of the non-performance of the agreement, and seeks to recover damages in respect thereof, he is in general required to set out the agreement in its executory form, and he sues in special assumpsit. (1 Wilson, 117.) "If a man agrees to build for another a house, to be paid for it, and he afterwards builds the house, in this case he has two ways of declaring, either upon the original executory agreement as to be performed in futuro, or upon an indebitatis assumpsit, when the house is actually built, and the agreement executed,"—that is to say, he may either treat it as an executed contract, suing for the debt incurred by the performance of his part, or as an executory contract, suing for a breach on the part of the other. In the one case he would allege that the defendant, in consideration that he would build a house, agreed to pay for it; but nevertheless, though he had performed his promise by building the house, the fendant has not paid the money. That would setting out the contract in its executory form. the other case—which is the one usually adopted—he would not do so; the contract would only come out inferentially, the declaration stating merely that the defendant was indebted to the plaintiff in so much for a house built for him at his request, &c. When an executory contract has been entered into, until one party has performed his part, the contract is said to be open; as long as it remains thus open, there is a promise on each side, and each of these promises is the consideration of the other. Where goods have been sold and not yet delivered, the seller is under an obligation to deliver the goods, and the buyer is under an obligation to pay for them. The undertaking to deliver the goods is the consideration for the promise of payment, and the undertaking to pay for the goods is the consideration for the promise to deliver them. In all such contracts as this, the thing to be forborne or done on the one part, is the consideration for the thing to be done or forborne on the other part.

If the agreement between the parties is that one of them shall do anything from which the other derives a profit, or from which a third person derives a benefit, or that one of them shall undertake any labour, or sustain any detriment or inconvenience, or forego any right, this is on one part a sufficient undertaking to constitute a consideration for the thing to be done or forborne on the other. Thus, if it is agreed between A and B that A shall deliver his horse to B; that A shall lend his horse to X Y, a third person; that A shall endeavour to procure a situation for B; that A shall forbear to sue B for payment (if he has a cause of action against him); that A shall practise a trade within a certain limited district; all these are things that A might promise or undertake, and in consideration of which B would promise in return, "If you will try to procure such and such a situation, I will give you 20*l.*" You are not bound to procure the situation; you have fulfilled your engagement if you "endeavour to procure." There is a case of this kind in Hobart, 105; and also in Smith's Leading Cases. (Lampleigh v. Braithwaite.) There it was held that the plaintiff, having, at the defendant's request, endeavoured to procure a pardon for him, an action would lie, though his endeavouring had failed. Again, that A shall forbear to sue B, provided he has a cause of action against him; for if he has no cause of action, his forbearance to sue is no forbearance at all. If a man says, "I will sue you if you do not pay me 20*l.*" and thereupon I promise to pay him the money, that is no consideration, unless he has a right of action. Again, were he to obtain such a promise, without having any legal claim upon me, it would be in the nature of extortion. But if he has a right of action, or if he has a reasonable ground for supposing that he has a ground of action, it is good. (Longridge v. Dorville, 5 B. & Ald. 117.) The giving up a suit instituted to try a question respecting which the law is doubtful, is a good consideration for consenting to pay a stipulated sum. In this case the question was doubtful, and the judgment of Holroyd was, "If a person is about to sue another for a debt for which the latter is not answerable, the mere consideration of forbearance is not sufficient to render him liable for that debt. Any act of the plaintiff, however, from which the defendant derives a benefit or advantage, or any labour, detriment, or inconvenience sustained by the plaintiff, is a sufficient consideration to support a promise. Now the consideration of forbearance is a benefit to the defendant, if he be liable, but it is not any benefit to him if he be not liable. The authorities cited proceed on that ground. This case differs materially from those; for here a suit actually commenced is given up, and a suit, too, the final success of which is involved in some doubt;" and there is a case of Edwards v. Baugh (11 M. & W. 641). That was on a demurrer, and the declaration was held bad, for not averring that there was a cause of action. Provided a consideration exist, the amount of it is immaterial; thus, in Bainbridge v. Firmstone (8 A. & E. 743), the contract declared on was this: "You have certain boilers; if you allow me to weigh them, I will undertake to return them safe." The question was, whether there was a good consideration to support the promise of returning them safe, and it was held that there was. The owner's allowing the other man to weigh them was a good consideration—the contract was a valid one. It is not necessary that the thing to be done on the one side should be for the advantage of the other. If a man undertakes that which is a labour or detriment to himself, he is entitled to a recompense, as if he gives up a claim on consideration to be paid so much. (Doctor and Student, Dig. 2, ch. 12.)

In order to constitute a consideration, the thing to be done or forborne must be of some value, and the mere doing it, if the person is already bound in law to do it, is not sufficient; for the other party gains nothing by the contract to which he is not already entitled. A has done an act from which B derives an advantage. If the act is not the result of any agreement, and A has done it without the knowledge or authority of B—unasked, voluntarily, and officiously—here there is no contract. What A has done, he did of his own head, and therefore cannot impose any liability on B; he cannot make B pay for it. Hence it is a rule in pleading, that if a man sues another in respect of any consideration that is executed and past, he must aver that the consideration was performed at the request of the other party. If a man sues another for money expended for his use, he must aver that it was so expended at his request. You will find that laid down in 1 Williams's Saunders, 264, note 1, and also 1 M. & G. 265; the point of which note is, that when the thing done is one which in its nature implies consent and request, it is not necessary there to aver the request. For instance, if you sue for goods sold and delivered to a man, it is not necessary there to say that they were delivered at his request, because the notion of a sale and delivery necessarily implies the consent of both parties (12 M. & W. 759); but if A were to sue B for work done; if he sued in debt, and stated in the declaration that B was indebted to him 20*l*. for work done by him for B, whereby and by reason of the non-payment an action accrued to him; or if he sued in assumpsit, and stated in the declaration that B was indebted to him 20*l*. for work done by him for B, and that being so indebted, B promised to pay, but hath disregarded his promise; in such case if he fail to allege that the work was done at the request of B, the declaration would be bad on demurrer, as not setting forth a sufficient cause of action. (Hunt v. Bate, Dyer, 272.) A servant was arrested and bailed, and after he was out on bail the master promised one of the persons who bailed him that he would bear him harmless. It was held that the action would not lie. The declaration stated, as the fact was, that the master, in consideration that a certain person had become bail for the servant, promised to bear him harmless. The Court held that action did not lie, for there was no consideration for which the defendant should be charged with the debt of the servant. But in another case, brought for a promise of 20*l*. to be paid to the plaintiff by the defendant, in consideration that the plaintiff, at the special instance of the defendant, had taken to wife the cousin of the said defendant, this was a good cause of action. In these cases we learn that no past consideration is good, if a previous request be not averred; the request, however, may be expressed or implied. As where an act has been done by one man from which another derives a benefit, any subsequent recognition of that would be considered evidence of a previous request. A has done work for the benefit of B. It is not reasonable that one man should do any thing voluntarily for the benefit of another, and then charge him with it. This would be forcing on him a liability without his concurrence. B is at liberty to adopt the act of A or not as he sees fit: if he does not adopt it, he incurs no liability; it cannot be averred that the thing was done at his request, and therefore he cannot be called upon to pay for it. If he does adopt it, and avails himself of what has been done, such adoption is evidence to support the averment of request, and his liability will be the same as if he had actually requested it. Suppose that, although he has the benefit of what A has done, the circumstances are such as to negative the possibility of actual previous request; then it would appear that he is not liable. (11 A. & E. 451.)

It is sometimes said that a moral obligation is a sufficient consideration for a promise; that if one person is under a moral obligation to pay another, and expressly promises to pay him, this promise is binding in law. It was said by Lord Tenterden, C. J. in Littlefield v. Shee (2 B. & A. 811), that this doctrine is one to be received with some limitation; at all events, where a claim exists in the nature of a legal or equitable debt, which, however, cannot be enforced, in consequence of some personal privilege of the debtor, or by the operation of an Act of Parliament, a subsequent promise to pay will be binding. Thus, in the case of a debt the recovery of which is barred by the Statute of Limitations, the debt itself exists, and a promise to pay it will be binding. So, when a bankrupt has obtained a certificate, he cannot be sued for debts due at the time of the bankruptcy; but if the debts are not satisfied in full, that which remains unpaid is still a debt, though the remedy is barred, and a subsequent promise to pay it will be binding. (Trueman v. Fenton, 2 Cooper, 554.) The result is the same if a man, after he comes of age, promises to pay a debt contracted during his minority. In all these cases a debt existed, which, if not barred by some positive rule of law, might have been enforced. Under such circumstances, the existence of the debt is a sufficient consideration to support a promise to pay it. When the claim which a man undertakes to satisfy is one which, under no circumstances, could be enforced against him, his promise has no effect, as in the case of Eastwood v. Kenyon. (11 A. & E. 438.)

This may be applied to the case of a beneficial act officiously done. If A has done an act, which ultimately is for the benefit of B, without being previously requested by B to do so, and, under such circumstances that a request cannot be inferred, there is no legal obligation to pay for it, and even an express promise to pay for it will be without consideration. Eastwood was appointed by a person executor of his will and guardian of his daughter. Eastwood, during the minority of his ward, managed her landed property, and laid out money upon it, which he raised by a promissory note. The ward, on coming of age, approved of and sanctioned the conduct of her guardian. After this she was married to Kenyon, who is the defendant in the suit. Eastwood brought the action against Kenyon to recover the money that had been raised in order to be expended on the estate.

In the declaration it was averred that the defendant had promised to pay, but it was not averred that the money had been raised or expended at his request. It therefore appeared that the promise relied on was made without consideration, from the nature of the thing. "Taking the promise of the defendant, as stated on this record, to have been an express promise, we find that the consideration for it was passed and executed long before, and yet it is not laid to have been at the request of the defendant, nor even of his wife while sole (though if it had, the case of Mitchinson v. Hewson shews that it would not have been sufficient), and the declaration really discloses nothing but a benefit voluntarily conferred by the plaintiff and received by the defendant, and an express promise by the defendant to pay the money. If the subsequent assent of the defendant could have amounted to a ratihabitio, the declaration should have stated the money to have been expended at his request, and the ratification should have been relied on as matter of evidence; but this was obviously impossible, because the defendant was in no way connected with the property or with the plaintiff when the money was expended." The point precisely decided in this case is, that as the money was not alleged to have been advanced at the request of the defendant, the declaration was bad. The judgment, however, goes on to say that it could not have been truly alleged to have been at his request, because the circumstances were such that he could not have requested it. In this case no intimation is made how an action might have been brought. It appears, however, that an action against Kenyon and his wife might have been supported, supposing the ratification by the wife to have been complete—i. e., supposing that on her coming of age she had assented to what was done, and promised to pay; if she had assented, and promised to pay for that which had been done for her during her minority, that, probably, would have been binding, and would have created a debt due from her, in respect of which the husband and wife would have been jointly liable after the marriage.

All agreements are void at common law where the thing agreed to be done on either side is immoral or fraudulent; contrary to the sound policy or the spirit of the law. An agreement entered into for any such purpose is invalid, and cannot be enforced; and if an illegal thing is performed according to the agreement, still no right is thereby conferred. For instance, in the case of an agreement between a publisher, who engages a printer to print an immoral work; this agreement is not binding, and cannot be enforced. Supposing the printer, having entered into the contract, refuses to perform it, the publisher cannot maintain an action against him for a breach of contract. (Popelot v. ———, 2 C. & P. 198.) I have already adverted to the effect of fraud as far as regards the case of one of the parties to a contract being deceived by the other. All that we have to consider here, is not whether it is on the ground of one of the parties being deceived, but on the ground of its being immoral or fraudulent as far as regards other persons. I shall have occasion to notice hereafter the effect of the 13 Eliz. by which all assignments made in the favour of creditors are made void, where two parties enter into an agreement to defraud a third party. There is the case of Coxshot v. Bennet (2 T. R. 763). The debtor was insolvent. All the creditors consented to accept seven shillings in the pound, but one of the creditors refused to sign the deed of assignment unless the debtor would give him a promissory note for the remaining thirteen shillings in the pound, and the debtor gave him a note. It appeared that unless this creditor signed the deed, the rest would also have refused. In course of time the note was sued on, and was held void, it being a fraud on the rest of the creditors; for, as they had all bargained for an equality of benefit, there was a clear understanding that they should all share alike; and although the creditor in question executed the deed, he did so on the faith of an implied agreement, whereby he secured to himself a further advantage. The general principle is stated by Buller, J. in 4 Taunton, 170, that secret agreements of this kind, made between an insolvent and one of the creditors, in order to induce the rest of the creditors to agree to a composition, are void. On the same principle, if a debtor takes the benefit of the Insolvent Debtors' Act, any agreement to give any one creditor a preference over the rest, is void, and cannot be enforced. (Jackson v. Davison, 4 B. & Ald. 691.) So it is by the Bankruptcy Act, and contracts in contravention of the policy of the Bankruptcy Act are void, even in matters not made void by the statute itself. M. ——— v. Wallis (3 T. R. 17). From the case first cited (Coxshot v. Bennet), it appears that where a contract is wholly void on account of fraud, such a contract cannot become the consideration of a subsequent promise.

If the subject-matter of the agreement constitutes what is termed maintenance of suit, or champerty, it is void. Maintenance is termed by Blackstone, "an officious intermeddling in a suit that no way belongs to one, by maintaining or assisting either party with money or otherwise to prosecute or defend it." There is a case Findon v. Parker (11 M. & W. 675, T. T. 1843), in which the rector of a parish claimed tithes in kind. The party liable to the tithe set up a modus. The landlords in the parish joined to resist the claim of the rector, and it was held they were not guilty of maintenance. It did not follow, in point of law, that though there was no modus over one field, there might not be over another; the right was not necessarily the same; and the landlords were not the persons primarily interested in the amount of the tithe, it properly falling on the tenant: still they were interested in it more or less, and they conceived themselves to be directly interested in the question relating to the tithe on that particular piece of land. Champerty (campi partitio) is "a bargain with the plaintiff or defendant to divide the land, or other matter sued for, between them, if they prevail at law; whereupon the champetor is to carry on the party's suit at his own expense." There is a case in the nature of champerty, Sturge v. Jones (7 Bing. 170).

Agreements are in like manner void, if they are against public policy; such as agreements for an unseasonable restraint of trade: thus an agreement for general restraint is illegal. As where a party undertakes not to exercise a particular trade at all. But an agreement for a partial and reasonable restraint is binding, if made on an adequate consideration. (Mitchell v. Reynolds, 1 P. W. 181; Horner v. Graves, 7 Bing. 743.) Where a tradesman takes an assistant into his service at a yearly salary, on certain conditions, one of which is, that the assistant shall not afterwards set up for himself, in the same trade, within so many miles of the town where the master carries on his business. In such cases a fair test cannot be applied without considering whether the restraint is such only as to afford a fair protection to the interests of the party in favour of whom it is given, and not so large as to interfere with the interests of the public. Whenever the restraint is larger than is necessary for the protection of the party on whose part it imposed, it can only be oppressive; and if oppressive, it is in the eye of the law unreasonable. Great difficulty may attend the application of the test; but it is clear the law will not enforce any agreement curtailing the rights both of the public and of the contending party, without it being necessary for the protection of him in whose favour it is made. If the restraint from carrying on a trade is larger than is consistent with the protection of the party, it must be clearly unreasonable in law; and a contract to enforce it is void. Even where the constraint is reasonable, there must be a consideration for it. Whether the agreement be by parol contract, or by deed, the consideration must in all cases be of some value. The Court cannot enter into the question whether it is equal, but it must be adequate. For the meaning of the word adequate, see Young v. Timmins (1 Tyr.), and Hitchcock v. Coker (6 A. & E. 438). The Queen's Bench had held, that the restraint was unreasonable, because it was unlimited in point of time; and that it could only be a reasonable restraint if it restrained one party from setting up as long as the other party carried on business; but, on the ground which I have stated, the Exchequer Chamber overruled the judgment of the Queen's Bench, holding the agreement in this case to be reasonable. There is another case, Mallan v. May (11 M. & W. 653). In these cases it is immaterial whether the agreement be by parol or specialty. Even if it is by specialty, and there is no consideration sufficient to support the contract, then the contract is not binding.

Armathwaite Castle and Estate, Cumberland.—The Right Hon. the Earl of Lonsdale has become the purchaser of Armathwaite Castle, estate, and manorial rights and appurtenances, beautifully situated on the river Eden, in Cumberland, consisting of about 700 acres of excellent land, and is about eleven miles N.E. of Penrith, and about eight miles S.E. of Carlisle. In the parish of Ainstable there are two manors, namely, the manor of Armathwaite and the manor of Ainstable. The manor of Armathwaite is a manor paramount; it has rents, services, ward, and fines, both certain and arbitrary, with the further privilege that, not only the demesne itself, but all the customary estates held of it, are toll free all over England.

An important sale by auction of an estate in Lincolnshire took place at the Mart, London, on Thursday last, by Mr. W. W. Simpson, who, after an introductory speech of considerable length, proceeded to describe the situation and advantages of the property (comprising nearly 2,200 acres of freehold land and advowson, situate in the parish of Broughton, near Brigg), the sale of which opened by a bidding of 55,000*l.*; and after a spirited competition between Lord Worseley and other influential capitalists, the estate was knocked down and sold for the sum of sixty thousand pounds to John Coupland, esq. of Skellingthorpe, near Lincoln.

PROVISIONALLY REGISTERED.

Sovereign Life Assurance Company,

No. 5, ST. JAMES'S-STREET, LONDON.

TO BE ESTABLISHED BY ACT OF PARLIAMENT,

FOR

THE ASSURANCE OF LIVES,

AND FOR EFFECTING ALL OTHER CONTRACTS DEPENDING UPON LIFE CONTINGENCIES, AND ALSO FOR GRANTING LOANS, UPON A NEW AND HIGHLY BENEFICIAL SYSTEM.

CAPITAL, £1,000,000, in 100,000 Shares of £10 each. Deposit, £1 10s. per Share.

Note.—In pursuance of the Act of Parliament, 10s. per Cent. only (or 1s per Share) will be received until the Company obtains a Certificate of complete Registration, when notice will be given for the payment of the residue of the Deposit, and the Company will commence its operations.

This Company will transact all the usual business of Assurance Companies, and in so doing will take advantage of the modern improvements which have been engrafted into the systems of Assurance, the result of the long-tested experience of old-established Offices for the Assurance of Lives.

Thus, Assurances will be granted upon the payment of one single Premium, or of Annual Premiums, or upon a limited number of payments, on a gradually decreasing or increasing scale, all of which payments may be made half-yearly, or quarterly, if more convenient.

Assurances will likewise be granted from 5,000*l.* downwards to any amount, thus opening the door of Assurance to many persons who have hitherto found it inaccessible.

The Company will also undertake the purchasing of contingent and reversionary Property, the granting of immediate Survivorships and Deferred Annuities, as also, the endowment of Widows and Children. It will, likewise, advance money on annuity, mortgage, or other security.

The multifarious operations connected with Life Assurance; for instance, the opportunities afforded to Husbands and Fathers of making a provision, after their death, for their Widows and Children; to Creditors, to compensate the loss which the death of their Debtors might occasion; in Marriage Contracts, to secure the terms of Settlement; to the possessors of Entailed Estates, to provide for the younger branches of their families; to persons possessed of Life Interest in Property, to provide for their relatives in case of their decease; to expectants of Property in Reversion, to insure a portion of it against contingencies; together with many other instances which might be enumerated, seem, of late years, to be better understood than formerly. It is with a view to facilitate these operations that the SOVEREIGN LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY has been formed; and it will be found that it offers to the public a new system of Loans, more beneficial to the Borrower, and yielding a better return to the Shareholder, than any system at present in use.

Thus, any person effecting an Assurance with this Company, can borrow THE FULL AMOUNT of the sum secured by the Policy, upon giving collateral security for the payment of the Premium, and interest on the loan, for a limited number of years, and will not, as in ordinary cases, be liable to be called upon to repay, in one sum and by a given day, the principal money lent.

In order to effect this, the Borrower will pay an increased rate of premium, beyond what would be required for the ordinary Assurance of his Life, which increased rate, together with the accumulations by way of interest, which the operations of the Company will enable it to realize, will, in effect, repay the principal sum to the Company in any given number of years, at the option of the borrower, who will, at the expiration of such period, be relieved from all further payments in respect of the Loan, and will, moreover, hold a Policy with the Company, of some years' duration; which he can, if he chooses, continue for the benefit of his family, or for the purpose of raising a future Loan, at the ordinary rate at which he would have been entitled to it at the time of the commencement of the original Loan.

In case the Borrower should die during the continuance of the Loan, he will not leave his property encumbered with a debt; but, on the contrary, his representatives will be entitled to receive the amount secured by the Policy, after deducting a sum equal to the unliquidated portion of the Loan. Or if, at any time, he should wish to pay off the Loan to the Society, he can do so upon advantageous terms.

* For example, a person aged twenty-five, who wishes to borrow 100*l.* to be liquidated in fifteen years, will have to insure in the Society to the amount of the Loan, and will pay an Annual Premium for such Assurance of 7*l.* 9s. 10d. in addition to 5 per cent. interest upon the Loan, making a total annual payment of 12*l.* 9s. 10d. for fifteen years only. It is obvious that the longer the period during which the Premiums are payable, the smaller will they be in amount.

Should the Borrower survive the period for which the Loan is contracted, he will, by these payments, have liquidated the principal sum lent, and will possess a Policy of some years' duration for 100*l.* which he can, if he chooses, continue at the ordinary rate of Premium.

If, on the other hand, the Borrower should die within the period assigned for the continuance of the Loan, say in the tenth year, he will not leave his property incumbered with a debt of 100*l.*; but, on the contrary, his representatives will be entitled to receive 61*l.* 12s. 9d. the then value of his Policy.

Or again: if at the same time (during the tenth year), he should desire to pay off his Loan, he will have to pay to the Society no more than 38*l.* 7s. 3d. and, still retaining his interest in the Policy, will be discharged from all further payments beyond the ordinary rate of Assurance.

The examples above given are deduced from the Tables of the Society, a reference to which will shew the relative Premiums payable at different ages for Loans of different durations.

It may be observed, also, that persons who have no desire to retain an interest in their Policies for the benefit of their relations, can insure at a much lower rate than persons who, as in the above examples, retain an interest in their Policies, both during the continuance, and after the termination of the period for which the Loans are contracted.

The advantages which this system offers to persons requiring temporary Loans, or wishing to pay off existing charges on their property are numerous, and only require to be fully known to be duly appreciated. First of all, the Borrower in this Society will be saved the expense of frequent transfers, as is the case with those who borrow from the usual sources; for he can in no case be required to pay off the Loan, except in the manner proposed, although, if he chooses, he can do so upon most advantageous terms to himself. Secondly, he has no apprehension in case of his death, of leaving a sum to be paid by his surviving relations, or to remain as a charge upon his property, for the Policy repays that portion of the Loan remaining unpaid in case of death; and, whenever that event may happen, he is certain that his family will reap some, and perhaps great, advantages from the Policy which he holds in the Society. And lastly, this system enables the Company to accept securities which would not be available for the purpose of ordinary Loans, inasmuch as the only security required is for the punctual payment of the Premium and Interest, and not for the principal sum lent. It is needless to remark, that many persons can furnish security, in the manner proposed, who could not provide it for repayment of the whole principal money by a given day.

For example a person desirous of entering into business, but deficient in the funds wherewith to do so, can, by effecting a loan for a given number of years,—paying in the meantime a premium out of his profits, which the loan from the company has been the means of realizing,—supply himself with the necessary capital to commence with, and thus lay a foundation for a prosperous business and an ultimate independency. Again, a person desirous of purchasing the house in which he resides, or one more suitable to him, can borrow of the Company the purchase-money, and by paying a Premium for a limited time, instead of rent to his landlord, will after the termination of such limited period, be the absolute owner of the property free from rent. And lastly, in all cases of settlements on marriage, compositions of debts, arrangements with creditors, &c., a person can avail himself of the advantages offered by this Company, to obviate the first great difficulty attendant in many cases upon such transactions, viz.—the want of ready money,—which deficiency, the experience of many can prove, has often rendered nugatory those efforts, which, in all probability, would otherwise have been crowned with success.

In addition, however, to the large number of Assurances which may be expected for the immediate purpose of raising loans, an equal inducement is held out to persons desirous of effecting Assurances, whose object is to provide for their relatives, and who may not, at the time they effect the Assurance, require a Loan.

By assuring with this Company persons will not only effectually provide for their families in case of death, but, at the same time, will furnish themselves with the means at any period of life, on any emergency or reverse of circumstances, of raising a Loan to the amount of their Policy, at the rate of Premium, in respect of their Life Assurance, at which the Policy was originally granted; thus securing to those who effect Assurances unconnected with Loans, the whole of the advantages of the system of Loan proposed by this Company, whenever they have occasion to avail themselves of it.

The profits of the Company will appertain to two classes of members, the proprietors of shares, and the assured. The profits arising from the Loan Department, and the policies connected therewith, together with a small proportion of the profits arising out of the Assurances unconnected with Loans by way of remuneration to the Shareholders for guaranteeing out of their capital, in case of need, the payment of Assurances falling due), will, after paying interest upon the paid-up Capital of the Company, be divided amongst the holders of shares in the Company. Three-fourths of the profits arising from the Assurance Department, unconnected with Loans, will be divided amongst the parties, either originally effecting Assurances, or who shall hold Assurances after the liquidation of their Loans. This distribution holds out to the Shareholder, in addition to interest upon the capital invested in shares, the prospect of a large remuneration; as also to the assured, an ample participation in the profits arising from the payment of premiums; which must necessarily be augmented, by the falling in of Policies into the Assurance Department, after the liquidation of the Loans originally granted upon them. The Assured, also, will have the security of a large subscribed guarantee Capital, to meet their claims upon the Company.

Prospectuses containing specimens of the Tables and every information can be obtained from, and applications for shares, in the annexed Form, made to, the Secretary, at the Company's Offices, No. 5, St. James's-street, London; Messrs. THE REPORTS.

Equity Courts.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S COURT.

Hills v. Croll.

January 11, 23, 31, and July 22.

Specific performance—Unilateral agreement—Mutual remedy—Injunction.

Where the court of equity cannot carry the whole of an agreement into execution, and the effect of a partial specific performance, which was sought to be enforced would be to bind one party only to a performance, or where an agreement cannot be performed once for all, the Court will not make a decree for a performance of the agreement in specie.

Upon a motion for injunction in a suit for the specific performance of an agreement, if the Court sees that no decree can be made at the hearing, it will not in the meantime grant an injunction.

By an agreement dated the 22nd of March, 1841, made between the defendant A. A. Croll and F. C. Hills, a manufacturing chemist, which recited that the defendant Croll had obtained two patents for manufacturing and purifying gas, and that he had agreed with the plaintiff Hills, in consideration of 200*l*. to grant unto the plaintiff, for the term of fourteen years from the date of the patents, "the exclusive right, at the option of him, the said F. C. Hills, of supplying him, the said A. A. Croll, and all and every other person or company of persons whomsoever, within ten miles of London, to whom, under this agreement, he, the said A. A. Croll, might during the said term of fourteen years grant any license to use the said patent processes, all the acids necessary for the manufacture of muriate of ammonia and sulphate of ammonia, on the principle of the said patent processes, or either of them, the said F. C. Hills supplying the acids at the average price of the day on which the same should be sold by Brandram, Farmer, and Groves, or the most respectable manufacturers thereof in or near London. And that the said A. A. Croll had agreed to grant unto the said F. C. Hills (subject to the option of the said F. C. Hills) the exclusive right of purchasing the whole of the muriate of ammonia and sulphate of ammonia that might be produced by the said patent processes, at the prices thereinafter mentioned. It was witnessed that, in consideration of the premises, and of 200*l*. to Croll paid by Hills, the defendant Croll did covenant with the plaintiff Hills, his executors, administrators, and assigns, that he (Croll) would for fourteen years from the date of the letters patent, purchase of the said F. C. Hills, and of no other person or persons whomsoever, without the consent in writing of the said F. C. Hills first obtained, all the acid that he, the said A. A. Croll, and all and every other persons and person, or company of persons within ten miles of St. Paul's Cathedral, whom he, the said A. A. Croll, might during the said term of fourteen years permit, or authorize, or grant license or licenses to use the said patent processes or either of them, might require, or might be necessary for the manufacture by him or them of muriate of ammonia, or sulphate of ammonia, in pursuance of the said patent processes. That Croll should pay for the same in the regular course of trade, at the average price as before stated; and the said Croll covenanted that he would, during the like period of fourteen years (unless the said Hills should refuse to purchase the same), sell and deliver unto the said Hills, and to no other person or persons whomsoever, without the consent in writing of Hills first obtained, the whole of the muriate of ammonia and sulphate of ammonia which might be, during the said term of fourteen years, produced by the said patent processes or either of them by the said Croll, and by all and every person and persons, and company of persons, within the distance of ten miles from St. Paul's, to whom the said Croll should during the term permit or authorize or grant license or license to use the said patent processes or either of them, at the following prices; that is to say, if from two to four tons per week only, then at the rate of 3*l*. 10s per ton below the market price; if from four to eight tons a week, then at the rate of 3*l*. per ton below the market price; if from eight to ten tons a week, then at the rate of 2*l*. 10s. per ton below the market price and if any quantity above ten tons a week, then at 2*l*. per ton below the market price. But if from any cause whatever the said A. A. Croll should at any time during the said term, not be able to obtain a like sum of 3*l*. 10s. per ton, 3*l*. per ton, 2*l*. 10s. per ton, and 2*l*. per ton, then and in that case, and as often as it should so happen, the said F. C. Hills should be entitled to purchase all the said muriate of ammonia and sulphate of ammonia at the same sum per ton below the market price as would leave to the said A. A. Croll an equal sum per ton benefi thereon.

The agreement then stipulated that Hills might supply either muriatic or sulphuric acid as he should think fit, and as he should consider muriate of ammonia or sulphate of ammonia to be most in demand. Croll was to deliver the salts of ammonia as Hills should direct, and Hills agreed to supply to Croll or his licensees all the acids they might require for the manufacture of muriate or sulphate of ammonia. The agreement then contained stipulations that Hills would pay for the salts of ammonia in the regular course of trade at the average price of the day; that Croll would not purchase acids of any other person than Hills, or sell any of the salts of ammonia to any other person; that Croll would not dispose of the letters patent; that both parties would promote the use of the patent processes; and that, in consideration of Hills's endeavours to promote the use of the processes amongst the gas companies, Croll agreed that Hills should be a party to all licenses granted; and that in such licenses the persons and companies should be bound to purchase all their acids of Hills and to sell to him their ammoniacal salts, upon the terms before agreed on as between Hills and Croll. There was also a stipulation that Croll would grant licenses to any persons at the request of Hills.

The patent process, so far as it is necessary to be described for the purpose of this report, consisted of a plan for passing the gas used for illumination over a weak solution of sulphuric or muriatic acid, whereby the ammonia contained in the gas combined chemically with the acid, and produced the neutral salt sulphate of ammonia or muriate of ammonia, according as the one acid or the other was used. The liquor thus produced was afterwards evaporated, and the sulphate or muriate of ammonia obtained in crystallized form.

Mr. Croll, a scientific chemist, being at the time of the agreement the manager of the works of the Chartered Gas Company, was induced to enter into the agreement above stated, with a view to procure the sulphate liquor evaporated, and the salts disposed of, for which the plaintiff, a manufacturing chemist at Deptford, was believed to have considerable facilities. Croll obtained his acids, and sent all his ammoniacal liquor to Hills, from the date of the agreement up to May 1842, when, being dissatisfied with Hills's account, he commenced to evaporate the liquor himself, and to dispose of the products; still, however, continuing to obtain the chief portion of his acids from Hills. From May to Sept. 1842, there were many differences between the parties, and several meetings and much correspondence occurred with respect to the terms of the arrangement between them, but, in fact, the agreement was not strictly acted upon; and after several attempts to arrange other terms, without success, the plaintiff Hills, on the 5th of Sept. 1842, wrote the following letter or proposal to the defendant Croll:—"Without intending to recede from our agreement, otherwise than I may do by this letter, as you seem to consider it has not turned out sufficiently beneficial to you, I have no objection, as you desire it, to permit you to make contracts with the gas companies in and near London, for the use of your patent processes, without my being a signing party to such contracts, you taking care that such companies are bound to use no other acid in the carrying out of your patent processes than what I supply, and that as you have given me to understand that you only mean to use sulphuric acid in the said processes, in consideration of your paying to me, when sulphate of ammonia is under 15*l*. per ton, 25 per cent. above the market-price, for my sulphuric acid, and when sulphate of ammonia is above 15*l*. per ton, then 30 per cent. above the market-price for my sulphuric acid, and I have no objection to recede to you my right of purchase, by our said agreement, of all the sulphate of ammonia, on the terms mentioned in such agreement. The market-price of the sulphate of ammonia shall be the average price at which the Chartered Gas Company, Mr. Grove, of Stratford, and I am selling at, and which shall now be fixed at 16*l*. per ton for the last twelve months, and the price of my sulphuric acid shall be the average price at which the same is sold by Farmer, of Kennington-common, and Brandram, of Size-lane, and which shall now be fixed at one penny per pound, with 20 per cent. discount, for the next twelve months; the acid to be paid for in the following manner; that is to say, what is had in one month shall be paid for in the course of the next following month. This proposition is of course made by me without prejudice to our agreement; and if you deviate from it in any respect, our original agreement is to remain as it is, notwithstanding any thing I have proposed to you herein to the contrary." This plan of paying an extra price for the acids had been adopted before the above letter of the 5th of September, 1842, was written by Hills, and was continued subsequently, though not upon the same terms in all respects as proposed in that letter, until 8th of December, 1843, when the plaintiff wrote to the defendant the following letter:—"As you have taken no notice of my letters, and I find you continue to have acid of other parties contrary to the agreement existing between us; and in your agreement with the Phœnix Gas Company you have not bound them to have acid of no one but myself, which by our last agreement you were bound to do; I therefore beg that you will consider this as notice to you (as you have broken your agreement above referred to of the 5th of September, 1842), that I shall insist on my right, under our original agreement, of being a signing party to any agreement you may make with any gas companies, that I may see that my interests are taken care of in pursuance of the agreement in my letter to you of the 5th of September, 1842. As the price of sulphate of ammonia has not been below 5*l*. per ton, I shall charge you for the last quarter thirty per cent. on the acid I have supplied; and I also hold you liable for the same per-centage on all the acid you have had of other parties during the last quarter; and I have left a blank in the inclosed account for you to fill up the quantities, which, if you refuse to do, I shall immediately get an injunction to stop your proceedings altogether."

In consequence of the last letter a meeting took place between the parties, when the defendant, Croll, stated that he would continue to purchase acids from other persons, and the plaintiff threatened to enforce the agreement. The defendant had granted several licenses without making the plaintiff a party, or paying any regard to the stipulations of the agreement of March 1841 in that respect. The defendant and his servants had also complained of irregular supplies of acids furnished by the plaintiff. The plaintiff, on the 12th of March, 1844, filed his bill against the defendant, and thereby prayed "that the agreement of the 22nd of March, 1841, or the same agreement as varied or modified by the said letter dated the 5th of September, 1842 (if the same was in fact thereby varied or modified), might be specifically performed; and that an account might be taken, under the direction of the Court, of all quantities of the aforesaid acids supplied by the plaintiff to the defendant or his order, or for his use, from the 22nd day of March, 1841; and the like account of all quantities of the said acids supplied by manufacturers other than the plaintiff to the defendant or his order, or for his use, or to any person or persons using the said patented processes, or either of them, under any licenses granted by the defendant since the agreement of the 22nd of March, 1841, and for other consequential directions, and for an injunction to restrain the defendant from violating, infringing, or evading the aforesaid agreement, dated the 22nd day of March, 1841, or the same agreement as varied or modified in manner aforesaid, and in particular from entering into any contract or contracts, agreement or agreements, with or for granting any license or licenses, permission or permissions, to any persons or companies, in violation of the terms of the said agreement; and from granting any license or licenses to any persons or companies to use, exercise, or vend the said inventions, or either of them, and from purchasing or receiving any quantity of the said acids, or either of them, from any person or persons other than the plaintiff, and from selling, disposing, or delivering, unto any person or persons, company or companies, other than the plaintiff, any quantities of muriate of ammonia, or sulphate of ammonia, produced by the said patented processes, or either of them. The plaintiff, on the 28th of March, moved upon notice for an injunction in the terms of the prayer of the bill. The defendant, by his answer, insisted that the agreement of the 22nd of March, 1841, did not embody the real arrangement between the parties; that it was never strictly acted upon, and that, after May 1822, it had been waived and abandoned by both parties.

Upon the original motion for an injunction, the Vice-Chancellor of England refused the application, with costs, and from that decision the plaintiff appealed to the Lord Chancellor.

Wakefield, James Parker, and Torriano, for the motion, contended that the plaintiff was entitled, at all events, to an injunction to restrain the defendant from purchasing acids from any other persons; they cited and referred to Wearer v. Sessions (6 Taunton, 153); Morris v. Coleman (18 Ves. 437); Kemble v. Kean (6 Sim. 333); Barrett v. Braggave (5 Ves. 555); Clarke v. Price (2 John Wilson's C. Bethell, Romilly, and Welford, for the defendant, contended that the agreement was unilateral, and such as a court of equity would not enforce. They cited the following cases:—Bell v. Hull and Selby Railway (1 Railway Cases, 160); Harnett v. Yeilding (2 Sch. & Lefr. 556); Flight v. Bolland (4 Ru. 298); Jervis v. Edwards (2 Drury & Warr. 80); Ripon v. Hobart (3 Myl. & Keen, 169); Smith v. Fromont (2 Swanst. 330); Clark v. Price (suprà); Baldwin v. Useful Knowledge Society (suprà); Hooper v. Broderick (11 Sim. 47); Kimberly v. Jennings (6 Sim. 304); Shackle v. Baker (14 Ves. 468); Young v. Timmins (1 Tyrw. 226).

JUDGMENT.

July 22, 1845.—The LORD CHANCELLOR.—In this case, Croll had obtained two patents for the purpose of purifying gas, and the result of the purification of gas was the manufacture of muriate of ammonia and sulphate of ammonia. He entered into a contract with Hills, who is the plaintiff in this suit, and the contract was to this effect: Mr. Croll was to purchase all the acids that he was to use in his process under his patent from Mr. Hills; Mr. Hills on his side was to have the right of purchasing all the ammonia that should be produced as the result of those processes, at certain prices as to the one and as to the other. In addition to this, there was a stipulation that in all the licenses that were granted for using those patents, the parties to whom these licenses were to be granted should be bound to purchase all the acids which were used in the processes from Mr. Hills; and that Mr. Hills should have the same option that he had in the case of Crolls, of purchasing from them all the ammonia that should be produced in the course of the processes. It was also stipulated that Mr. Hills should have the option to supply either muriatic acid or sulphuric acid, as he should think proper, regulating his option by the market prices of muriate of ammonia and the sulphate of ammonia. I think this is the substance of the original agreement between these parties. The agreement was entered into the month of March 1841. It was found on the part of Mr. Croll that the mode of payment and other arrangements with respect to this agreement were inconvenient, in consequence of which a correspondence takes place between him and Mr. Hills in the month of September 1842, and the agreement was modified according to the terms of a letter, dated, I think, in September, written by him. One of the stipulati[ons of the original] agreement was that Mr. Hills should be a signing party in all the licenses that were granted by Mr. Croll for the use of the patent. The first stipulation in the letter of September was, that he should not be required to be a signing party, but it provided that there should be [a c]ovenant in all those [agreem]ents, to the effect stated [in] the original agreement, namely, that the parties to whom the licen[ses w]ere granted should purchase their acids from Hills and give Hills the right to purchase the ammonia. R[eg]ulations were also made altering the terms on which the acids were to be purchased and the ammonia to be sold. There were some other subordinate stipulations to which it is not necessary at present to advert. The lett[er, h]owever, concluded with a stipulation to this effect, that if Mr. Croll was in any particular to depart from the agreement so modified, the original agreement was to be enforced. I think those two documents, the original agreement and the letter of September, formed the substance of the contract between the parties as it existed after September 1842. Some doubt was expressed as to whether or not the contract so modified has been acted upon in that shape. But it appears beyond all doubt that it was so acted upon, because the accounts were from time to time rendered on the footing of the modified agreement, and it is also clear from the letter of Mr. Hills, of the 8th of December, 1843, in which he refers expressly to the prices that were regulated by the letter of September 1842.

Another question arose in the course of the discussion as to whether or not that second agreement, the modified agreement, had been put an end to by the operation of the clause by which it was stipulated, as I have already said, that in case of any deviation from the agreement, the original agreement should be enforced. It was said that considerable deviations had taken place, and that Mr. Hills had availed himself of those deviations to put an end to the agreement, and the letter of the 8th of Dec. was relied on for that purpose; but I think the letter of the 8th of Dec. cannot be relied on entirely for that purpose, for this reason; it only gave notice to put an end to one term of the modified agreement, namely, that which related to its being required that Mr. Hills should be a signing party to the agreement for the licenses. Now Hills had no right to put an end to or depart from that modified agreement; therefore I consider that notice in December as not having the effect of putting an end to the modified agreement of September. But however at a period subsequent to September 1842, it appears by a letter from Croll that he refused to act upon the footing of that agreement, he insisted on paying for the acids at the market prices, and there is a letter from Mr. Hills' solicitor, in which he insists on the agreement of March, the original agreement of March 1841. Now taking all these documents together, if it was necessary for me to come to any conclusion upon the subject, I should conclude the substituted agreement had been put an end to before the institution of this suit, that is, provided there has been a deviation from the original agreement; but it would be a question of fact to be decided. However, it is unnecessary for me, for the purpose of the present question, as I apprehend, to come to any conclusive decision on that point; it will be material on the hearing of the [caus]e, because, on taking the accounts, if there should be a decree in favour of the plaintiff on those accounts, they will be regulated according to the conclusion as to whether or not the subsequent agreement had been binding or not. Those are the facts of the case necessary for the purpose of raising the narrow question, as it appears to me, which the Court has to de[cide].

The bill was filed for the purpose of calling on the Court to declare that that agreement should be specifically performed. Now there is no principle of this court which I understand to be more clearly established than this, that the Court will not decree an agreement to be performed, unless it can execute the whole of the agreement. The question, therefore, in this case will be, whether the Court has power, from the nature of this agreement, to execute the whole of it—every part of it. Part of the prayer, which is consequent upon a specific performance, is, that the defendant should be restrained from purchasing acids from any one but Mr. Hills; and also that he should be restrained from granting licenses according to the agreement that was in force between the parties. Now, then, with respect to the first of these points, there is a stipulation on the part of Hills that he will supply the acids; there is a stipulation on the part of Mr. Croll that he will purchase from Hills, and from no other person. Has the Court any power to compel Mr. Hills to comply with that? Can the Court order Mr. Hills to continue the manufacture of acids for the purpose of supplying Mr. Croll? Can the Court call upon him, if he should not manufacture acids, and require him to purchase acids for th[e] purpose of supplying Mr. Croll? It is clear, I apprehend, that the Court has no such power. The[re] are cases where the Court will do indirectly wha[t] it cannot do directly. A case commonly cite[d] for that purpose is the case of a nuisance. The Court would not compel a party who ha[d] erected a wall to the nuisance of another, b[y] any direct order to pull down that wall, but the Cour[t] can make an order requiring him not to continu[e] the nuisance, which would have the effect of com[]pelling him to pull down the wall. In the case of Morris v. Coleman, the Court restrained Mr. Colema[n] from writing for any other theatre than the Haymarket, inferring from that that the order of the Court would compel Mr. Coleman, or have the tendency to compel him, to write for the Haymarket Theatre. But in this case the Court has no power to compel Mr. Hills to supply acids by ordering him not to supply acids to any other person; that is not the agreement, nor was it ever intended that it should be the agreement. Therefore, unless the Court can compel him by a direct order to supply Mr. Croll from time to time with the acids that he requires, it is quite clear that this Court cannot execute all the parts of this contract; the Court cannot therefore compel the party specifically to perform the contract.

It was thrown out in the course of the argument, that this Court might compel one party to perform his part of the contract and leave the other party to his remedy at law; but no such principle has ever been acted on in this Court, and it has been so laid down over and over again. And in a recent case, before Sir Edward Sugden, that was cited at the bar, it was decided that unless this Court can execute every part of the contract, it will not compel a specific performance of a part. When this cause, therefore, comes to a hearing, I am of opinion, according to the facts as they at present stand, and according to the statement of the principle I have mentioned, this Court cannot restrain Mr. Croll from purchasing acids elsewhere, because it cannot compel Mr. Hills, on his side, to furnish all the acids that may be necessary for the manufacture carried on by Mr. Croll. If the Court cannot do this, it cannot restrain the parties at the hearing. It is quite clear that, upon this interlocutory application, the Court cannot restrain Mr. Croll from purchasing acids elsewhere; I apprehend therefore, the decision of the Vice-Chancellor, which was shortly stated, proceeded upon that principle, and rightly, upon the grounds I have stated; and that which is the principle of this Court. And the principle on which the Vice-Chancellor acted with respect to the other part of the case is correct, and equally applies to that part of the notice of motion with respect to the licenses, because that forms a part of the general contract; and if the Court cannot execute the whole of the contract, it cannot execute the contract in part; therefore I am of opinion, that in this case the motion must be refused, and refused with costs.

VICE-CHANCELLOR KNIGHT BRUCE'S COURT.

CORNFIELD v. WYNDHAM.

Construction of will—"Legacies."

The word "legacies," used in a will, held not to include annuities.

George Wright made his will, dated the 17th of March, 1794, which, so far as relates to the question in this cause, was as follows:—"I direct my funeral expenses, and the charges of proving this my will, and all debts owing by me at the time of my decease, and all legacies which I give by this my will, or shall give by my codicil or codicils thereto, or by any writing or writings signed by me or in my handwriting, and whether witnessed or not, shall, unless I expressly direct the contrary, be paid immediately upon or after my decease out of my personal estate; but if that shall be insufficient to answer the same, I charge my real estate with the deficiency." The testator then gave annuities to each of his servants who should have lived with him a certain time before his death. The testator, after making a codicil not affecting the matter in question, executed a second codicil, which was in the following terms:—"To John Crawley and Samuel Crawley, my executors, I direct the underwritten annuities by me granted to the names inclosed may be paid half-yearly out of my personal or from the income of my estates. George Cornfield, 30*l.*; Jane Smith, 50*l.*; R. Smith, 30*l.*; William Hammond Hovell, 20*l.*; Ann and Mar Roberts, 60*l.*; ditto to Ann Roberts, 25*l.*; Mrs. Mary Cook, interest on 300*l.* and annuity, 60*l.*; Ann Nash, 60*l.*; Thomas Wright Steward, 50*l.*; 385*l.* All the above annuities I leave to be paid as above directed." This bill was filed by one of the annuitants, and prayed a declaration that the real estates of the testator were charged by the will with the payment of the annuities given by the second codicil. To this bill a demurrer was filed, and by arrangement the cause was set down to take the opinion of the Court upon the question raised.

Hodgson and J. Bailey, for the demurrer, cited Shepherdson v. Tower (1 Y. & C. C. C. 441), and Rose v. Cunynghame (12 Ves. 29).

Swanston and W. R. Ellis, for the bill, cited Buckeridge v. Ingram (2 Ves. jun. 652); Chiquin v. French (1 Ambler, 41); Swift v. Nash (2 Keen, 20); Stubbs v. Sargon (2 Keen, 255); and Nannock v. Horton (7 Ves. 390).

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—The instruments are not fully before the Court. The case arising upon demurrer, they cannot properly be so, but they are sufficiently before the Court. The testator begins by directing as follows. [His Honour then read the part of the will and the second codicil before set forth.] The question is, whether, upon this will, the word "legacies" is to be read as including annuities. The word "legacies" is a term under which annuities bequeathed may, without impropriety, be described; familiarly and colloquially, it has a more restricted meaning; legally it may, according to circumstances, receive a larger interpretation. How this case would have stood if the will had not contained any thing explanatory of the sense in which the testator meant to use the term, it is unnecessary to say. The language of the will appears to demonstrate that he did not use it as including annuities. The words "paid immediately after my decease;" the specific charge which the will contains of the annuities given to the servants upon the real estate; the mode of payment which he prescribes; the omission of any repetition in the expression of a charge upon the real estate as to the mere pecuniary legacies, satisfy me of the construction; nor if the first codicil had been stated in the bill would my opinion have been different.

Demurrer allowed, without costs; liberty to amend the bill.

CLARK v. BURGH.

An assignment by a husband and wife of chattels leasehold, to which he was entitled in right of his wife, reserving the right of redemption to the husband, his heirs, executors, or administrators, and providing that, upon payment of the mortgage-money, the assignment should be void, was held, under the circumstances of the case, not to have affected the wife's right by survivorship.

This case came on upon exceptions to the Master's report. The suit was instituted by the creditors of James Burgh, deceased, and upon a reference to the Master he was directed to inquire whether the widow of James Burgh had any interest in certain leasehold property. James Burgh being entitled, in right of his wife, to an undivided share in some chattels leasehold, he and his wife assigned the share, by an indenture dated the 3rd of August, 1831, to Edwards, and by the same indenture, the wife executed a power of appointment over other property in favour of Edwards, to hold to Edwards, his executors, administrators, and assigns; and it was provided, that in case James Burgh, his heirs, executors, or administrators, should pay to Edwards, his executors, administrators, or assigns, the mortgage-money with interest, by a certain day, the assignment and appointment should cease and be void. The money was not paid at the day appointed, and shortly afterwards the wife acquired another share in the leaseholds, which share was for her separate use.

On the 24th of November, 1834, James Burgh assigned (among other things) the shares to which he was entitled in right of his wife, to Houseman, subject to the mortgage to Edwards, &c.; and it was provided, that on payment of the mortgage-money, with interest, on a certain day, the assignment should be void. Before these mortgages were made, the leaseholds had been assigned to Mr. Pocock, for the purpose of making a division among the persons entitled to the different shares. After the execution of the mortgages, Mr. Pocock made his award, and allotted certain houses to Burgh and his wife, in right of the wife in severalty, in lieu of their shares. By indenture dated the 23rd day of February, 1838, and indorsed on Edwards's mortgage-deed, all the parties interested assigned to Edwards the property which had been allotted to Burgh and his wife, in right of his wife, and Sophia Bishop Burgh exercised her power of appointment in favour of Edwards, subject to a proviso for reassignment upon repayment of the mortgage-money and interest on a certain day, by Burgh and his wife, or either of them, their, his, or her executors or administrators, or any person or persons on their, his, or her behalf. This deed was in substitution for the former mortgage to Edwards, and a similar substituted assignment was made to Houseman on the following day. The Master having found these facts, and that James Burgh died in 1843, intestate, indebted in various sums besides those due on the said securities, he found that Sophia Bishop Burgh had not any interest in the leasehold estates comprised in the mortgage securities or any part thereof.

To this report exceptions were taken by Sophia Bishop Burgh.

Swanston and Lloyd, for the exceptions, cited Pitt v. Pitt (Turn. & Russ. 180); Bates v. Dandy (2 Atk. 207); Watts v. Thomas (2 P. Wms. 364); Purdew v. Jackson (1 Russ. 33 n.) and Coke upon Littleton, 46 b.

Russell and Speed, for the report, cited Druce v. Denison (6 Ves. 394).

Roll and Trower, for defendants in the same interest, cited Donne v. Hart (2 Russ. & Myl.) and Oglander v. Barton (1 Vern. 396).

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—When a mortgage is made by an instrument not containing a recital of any intention of doing more than making a mortgage, the Court regards the instrument with an inclination to believe that nothing more was intended than that which was necessary to make the estate a security to the mortgagee for the money advanced; and the mere circumstance that the proviso for redemption points in terms to a mode of reconveyance of the interest not in conformity with the title, is generally not sufficient to induce the Court to depart from that presumption. The general rule is sufficiently established by Innes v. Jackson (1 Bligh, 127), as well as various other decisions. Now the present case stands thus: Various members of a family were equitably entitled in undivided interests in certain chattels leasehold. One of these was a married woman. Part of her interest belonged to her for her separate use, and part absolutely, and not for her separate use and benefit, and therefore, as to the latter, it was her husband's, in her right, in the sense in which the law uses that term in the case of chattels leasehold. All the parties interested in this leasehold property joined in vesting the property in a trustee, Mr. Pocock, a gentleman who was intrusted with the duty of making a division and allotting it in proportion to the several interests of the parties. At this time the husband, Mr. Burgh obtains a loan on the two parts of that portion of this property which belonged to him in right of his wife, and there is the mortgage to Edwards in which she joins, and which contains property that the husband could effectually dispose of without her, and property which could not be effectually alienated without her concurrence; and the proviso for redemption is, that if the husband or his executors, &c. should pay, the assignment should become void. Then the second mortgage is made by the husband, the wife not joining, which, whether it comprises property which he could dispose of without her consent or not, it is not material to consider. It comprises only property which he could alienate without her consent, and the proviso for redemption is the same as in the first instance, namely on the payment of the money by the husband, his heirs, executors, &c. the assignment shall become void. Then after this transaction Pocock makes the allotments for the division of the property, and then other deeds are made in favour of the two mortgagees, with respect to which, whether or not they included other property, is now immaterial. The wife joins in each of these, as does the trustee and the husband, and the proviso for redemption in the mortgage in favour of Edwards is then in a different form; not that on the payment of the money the assignment shall become void, which would have had this inconvenient effect, and this might have been the result, if it did touch the legal estate, of vesting it in Pocock. This may be the reason for a change in the form. The form is on payment by the husband, wife, or either of them, or his or her heirs, executors, &c. or the heir, executor, &c. of either of them, the property shall be assigned to him, her, or them. That was correct. There is also a power of sale, and after the usual direction as to appropriation, the clear surplus is to be paid to the husband or wife, their heirs, executors, &c. according to their respective interests. The mortgage to Houseman, in which she did not join before, is made in the same form as if she had joined, and this may be accounted for by the circumstance that in the second mortgage was included property which could not be alienated without her concurrence; and the proviso for redemption and the trust for sale were in the same words as in the first mortgage. Now, that these alienations were absolute at law one can doubt, for the money was not paid in either case at the time appointed. It is quite clear, from the argument on both sides, as far as the mortgagees were concerned, the assignment had never become absolute in equity. The mortgages are still redeemable by some person or persons; but the question is, whether alienations of the nature which I have mentioned have or have not become absolute in equity in favour of the husband or his alienees, or any of them, against the wife who has survived the husband. This depends upon the intentions of the husband, which are to be collected from all, or some, or one of the several instruments executed by him. As I read the instruments, not one of them exhibits such an intention against the wife on the part of the husband as would affect her rights further than to give the alienees security for the money advanced. It does not appear to me that her rights in equity are more prejudiced than if the mortgages had ly been deposits of the deeds by him to secure money; and in such a case the legal estate would not have been affected. The mortgages were mere pledges, and were intended to be nothing more. But it was said that there was some argument against the wife, from the circumstance that property to which she was entitled for her separate use was included. I see nothing in that argument against her. I differ, with great respect, from the conclusion to which the learned Master has come; but it appears to me that he did not have before him Pitt v. Pitt, and the other cases now cited. But however this may be, I feel myself bound to allow the exception.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

RUSSELL v. LEDSAM.

A patent for an invention of welding iron pipes by continuous circumferential pressure is not vitiated by a prior patent for welding such pipes by circumferential pressure not continuous, but intermittent.

The specification having described the invention to consist in passing pipes through a fixed hole, Held, that the passing such pipes through grooved rollers in motion was an infringement of the patent. (Russell v. Cowley, Pat. Ca. 467; 1 Cr. M. & R. 864, confirmed.)

An improvement upon the precise mode described in the specification may be an infringement of the patent.

The adoption of a material part of the process described is an infringement.

The day of the date of the letters patent is inclusive, and not exclusive, so that the term of 14 years, granted by letters patent dated the 26th of February, 1825, would expire at midnight on the 25th of February, 1839; aliter as to the enrolment of the specification.

The term "prosecute with effect" in the 4th section of the statute 5 & 6 Wm. 4, c. 83, relates to the obtaining the report of the Judicial Committee, and not to the actual issuing of the letters patent.

The Crown may grant new letters patent under the statute after the expiration of the original letters patent.

New letters patent having been granted upon the condition that an annuity should be secured to the original inventor, whether such annuity is secured before or after the granting of the new letters patent is immaterial.

The Crown has authority under 5 & 6 W. 4, c. 83, s. 4, to grant new letters patent to the assignee of the original letters patent.

The case of Spilsbury v. Clough (2 G. & D. 17) explained.

The 7 & 8 Vict. c. 69, ss. 4 & 7, confirming prior grants of letters patent to assignees, with certain exceptions, is not declaratory of the statute 5 & 6 Wm. 4, c. 83, s. 4, which must be construed by its own provisions.

J. Jervis, Q. C., M. Smith, and Webster, for the plaintiff.

Kelly, Q. C., W. H. Watson, Q. C., Rotch, and J. Henderson, for the defendants.

The material part of the argument, which was extremely long, appears from the judgment.

JUDGMENT.

PARKE, B. now delivered the judgment of the Court as follows:—Several questions of importance arose and were discussed in this case, which was argued during the last Term. It was an action for an infringement of a patent, in which the plaintiff had a verdict, subject to a question reserved by my brother Alderson on the 7th and 9th pleas. A motion for a new trial was also made, on the ground that the verdict was against evidence, on the issues on the novelty and on the infringement of a patent. These two questions are of much importance, and were very fully and ably discussed; we have considered them, and are of opinion that the invention was new; and we have also come to the conclusion that the defendant has been guilty of an infringement. In order to decide whether the invention was new, it will be necessary, first, to define what the nature of the invention was. In the case of Russell v. Cowley, this Court had already decided that the principle of the invention was, the welding of iron pipes, in a state of welding heat, without a maundrill or internal support, and with circumferential pressure; and that the absence of a maundrill was sufficient to distinguish the plaintiff's patent from that of James and Jones in which the maundrill was used, where the welding of the skelp or incomplete pipe was performed by hammer and by a pair of grooved rollers, both modes being made use of under that patent. On the trial of that case, however, the patent granted in 1824 to Mr. James Russell was not given in evidence by the defendants. This patent was for welding iron pipes, in a similar state of heat, placed in a semi-cylindrical recess in an anvil, by means of a tilt-hammer with a similar recess; and by a succession of blows the edges were beaten together with or without a maundrill. After this process, the pipe was passed through rollers that made a cone, and passed a maundrill, over which the inside of the tube passed, by which means the inside was rendered smooth and the outside was finished. This patent, it was contended, was for circumferential pressure, and without a maundrill, and therefore was the same in principle as the plaintiff's, and consequently the latter could not be supported. It appears to us, however, that the principle of the two inventions is not the same; for James Russell's does not operate .. continuous equal circumferential pressure, as plaintiff's does, but by the repetition of violent .tact of short duration; the impact by hollow grooves striking on each other does not become equal continuous circumferential pressure until the close of the operations; it does not cause an equal continuous circumferential pressure throughout the whole operations, and in effect, as was well observed by the learned counsel for the plaintiff, James Russell's invention ends where the plaintiff's begins. We therefore think that the jury have not come to a wrong conclusion on the question of the novelty of the invention. It is then said that, in order to carry the plaintiff's invention into effect, the drawing of the pipe through a fixed hole, and that of a conical or bell-shaped form, is necessary; that it is an essential part of the plaintiff's patent; and that the defendant has not infringed it, for his apparatus does not move the pipe through a fixed hole. There is no relative motion between the pipe and the rollers, and that it does not draw out or stretch the pipe. It is on this part of the case that some of us have entertained doubts, more than on the others; but after much consideration we do not see any reason to differ in opinion with the jury, and we think that the defendant's mode, though it is an improvement in some respects on the plaintiff's patent, is the same in others, and that therefore it is an infringement of it. In order to carry Whitehouse's invention into effect, it is clear that the pipe must be moved through a fixed hole: it is not to remain stationary, or the operation of continuous circumferential pressure on the whole tube could not be performed. In the specification, the mode of accomplishing this is by instruments which draw; but the invention is expressly stated not to be confined to the employment of the precise apparatus described, but the principle is said to be, to heat the tubes of iron, to pass them in a state of welding heat through dies or holes, and so unite the edges together; in order to effect which the dies or holes are of a bell-mouthed shape, and thereby the joint becomes firmly welded; and this principle the defendant seems to us to have infringed. In his mode of operating, the skelp, or unfinished pipe, is received into an irregular conical or bell-shaped space (not that in the guard, but formed by the rollers), and passes along with the surface of the rollers to a hole formed by them, and to a point where the circumferences are in contact; and this hole is of a fixed definite size, and always in the same place though its sides are moving, and are continually formed of a different material. Through this bell shaped hole the pipe is passed, and the same sort of pressure in the orifice of the bell mouth, and the same sort of pinch at the narrowest part take place as at the plaintiff's bell-mouth hole. In that respect it is the same as the plaintiff's patent. There is a continued equal or circumferential pressure without a maundrill; but in other respects no doubt there is a difference, and, on the whole, perhaps, an improvement. There may not be the same injury to the fibre of the iron as by the drawing process, which weakens and attenuates the tube, and the method of operating is more convenient than that by which the plaintiff carries his principle into effect. But if the process is, as we think it is in a material part, the same, the defendant has been guilty of an infringement. There ought, therefore, to be no new trial. The next question arises on a point reserved at the trial on the evidence in support of the seventh plea. The plea was, that the second or renewed letters patent were granted after the expiration of the term of fourteen years, granted by the first letters patent. The replication took issue on that allegation, and the proof was, that the original letters patent were dated on the 26th of February, 1825, the second on the 26th of February 1839; and the question to be considered is, whether the day of the date of the first letters patent was inclusive or exclusive. The usual course in recent times seems to construe it to be exclusively whenever any thing was to be done in a certain time after a given event or date; and consequently the time for enrolling the specification within the six months given by the proviso is reckoned exclusively of the day of the date and many other instances are re-collected in the cases of Webb v. Fairmaner (3 M. & W. 473), and Young v. Hagan (6 M. & W. 49). But in this case the question is, when the term given by the patent commences; and the same rule would apply as to the commencement of a term, which, if it is to run from the date of the lease, equally runs from the day of the deed. It was asked by Mr. Kelly whether, if there should be an imitation of the invention on the day the patent was dated, it would be an infringement of it; and we have no doubt the answer ought to be that it would, and, if so, the day of the date would be included, and the patent would expire at midnight on the 25th of December, 1839 (for the law never takes notice of the fraction of a day, except where there are conflicting rights between subjects). Our opinion therefore is, that the verdict on the issue on the 7th plea must be entered for the defendant, pursuant to leave reserved. The plaintiff then avails himself of the liberty given to move for judgment non obstante veredicto, on his plea, on the ground that, under the 5 & 6 Wm. 4, c. 83, renewed letters patent are not void, if dated after expiration of the former term. This question depends on the construction of the section, which admits of some doubt. The use of the term prolongation and extension would seem to indicate one continuous term without an interval, while on the other hand, the remainder of the clause appears not to require it. It enacts that the Judicial Committee may on petition consider and report that the extension should take place, and the King may grant new letters patent for a term not exceeding seven years after the expiration of the first term; and then follows the proviso that no such extension shall be granted, that is by the Crown, if the application by petition shall not be made and prosecuted with effect before the expiration of the term. The prosecuting with effect, which is to warrant the Crown to grant, means, according to the ordinary construction of the sentence, a prosecuting with effect prior to or independent of that grant, and not the grant itself, and that must be the obtaining the report of the Judicial Committee, or the approbation of it by the Crown, and if so, there is no necessity for the new letters patent to be actually issued before the expiration of the old. It is asked, then, may the Crown grant at any interval after the expiration of the term, so that the new term do not exceed seven years from the end of the old one, and what will be the condition of the persons who make use of the invention between the end of the old and the beginning of the new patent. It seems to us that there is no limit except the discretion of the Crown, and it is to be presumed that the grant will not be made after a long interval, or at least without protecting those who have invested their capital in order to use the invention, and such, if any, who have done so before the expiration of the first patent will always have an opportunity of being heard in the Judicial Committee against the petition for an extension. With respect to those persons who use it in the interval, there is no doubt they are not responsible. The conclusion at which we have arrived is, that the legislature did not intend to restrict the Crown as to the actual date of the grant, if all the preliminaries were completed before the expiration of the term; and therefore it appears to us that the 7th plea is bad. The defendant, in order to have availed himself of the proviso, should have pleaded that the petition was not prosecuted with effect within the meaning of the terms of the first patent; and compliance with this condition, which is introduced in the form of the proviso, need not be averred by the plaintiff in his declaration, but the non-compliance should have been pleaded by the defendant. The next question is, whether the issue raised by the traverse of the 9th plea ought to be found for the plaintiff; and we think it ought. There is an allegation in the declaration that her Majesty granted new letters patent to the plaintiff upon his securing to Cornelius Whitehouse, the original inventor, an annuity of 500*l.* so long as it should last; and the declaration contains an averment that, from the making of the new letters patent hitherto, the annuity has been duly secured to Cornelius Whitehouse. As to the new letters patent, it appeared on the trial that, before the day of the new patent, namely on the 1st of June, 1836, the plaintiff and Whitehouse had covenanted by indenture that Whitehouse should petition for new letters patent, and should assign them to Whitehouse; that he should work in the manufacture of tubes for Russell and his partners, and serve them in their trade during the term, and give them the benefit of all improvement that he might effect in the manufacture of tubes according to the invention; and the plaintiff did thereby covenant, during the new term, to pay 300*l.* per annum, and allow Whitehouse to live rent-free in a house of his, with a proviso to deduct a sum not mentioned for every day he might be absent or not working. Afterwards, on the 17th of December, 1838, by another indenture, reciting the petition of the plaintiff for an extension of the patent, and that the petition had been heard before the Judicial Committee and that an extension of the patent was expected to be granted, the plaintiff covenanted to pay Whitehouse 500*l.* per annum instead of 300*l.*, and to exonerate him from the obligation of working for and serving the plaintiff during the new term or otherwise, and stipulated that the 500*l.* annuity should not be subject to deductions. The defendant contended that the stipulation to secure the annuity of 500*l.* was a condition precedent to the validity of the new patent, and that the averment in the declaration, that it was secured, was not proved, for two reasons: first, because the grant of annuity was not executed after the grant of the new letters patent, the condition of requiring the future . . . . late one, which was clogged with a covenant on the part of Whitehouse, contained in the deed of July 1836, to give the benefit of future discoveries during the new term, and therefore was not to receive the annuity absolutely, which covenant was not released by the new deed, although the covenant to work and serve was. We think, that neither of these objections ought to prevail. As to the first, we think that the averment in the declaration, that the annuity was at the date of the new letters patent secured, is certainly proved, and that the objection ought to be in arrest of the judgment; that the declaration was insufficient, as it did not aver the security given for the first term subsequently to the date of the new patent. In that shape, however, we think the objection equally unavailing; because the meaning of the condition is, that there should be a security to Whitehouse for the annuity; and whether given before or after the letters patent, is immaterial. With respect to the second objection, we think that the covenant in the indenture of June 1836, to give the benefit of any improvements, is only incidental to the working of the plaintiff in the manufacture of tubes during the term, and is part of the service therein stipulated to be performed, and consequently was released by the second indenture; so that, under the two indentures together, Whitehouse has the benefit of an absolute unconditional covenant to be paid 500*l.* a year. Besides, the second indenture, at all events, contains such a covenant; and this appears to be sufficient, though a part of the covenant is in the first instance obligatory on Whitehouse, especially as it must be taken on the evidence that Whitehouse was satisfied with the security. The verdict, therefore, must stand for the plaintiff on the 7th issue. The only remaining question is, whether the declaration is bad on a motion in arrest of judgment. The defendant insists that, under the statute of 5 & 6 Wm. 4, c. 83, new letters patent cannot be granted to the assignee of original letters patent, and the objection, if it be one, appears on the record. This depends on the construction of the 4th section of the Act, which provides that if any person who now hath, or shall hereafter, obtain any letters patent as aforesaid, shall advertise, &c. and petition, the Crown may grant an extension of the patent. The words "as aforesaid" may mean such patent as aforesaid, and refer to the previous description of the patent only, that is, "a patent for the sole making, &c. of a new invention," or they may mean to refer to a description of the title of the person obtaining the patent,—the grantee, assignee, or otherwise. On the former definition, the plaintiff would be entitled, because he has, at the time of passing of the Act, the letters patent. But it is argued, if this construction be admitted, the possessor, as assignee of a patent at the time of passing the Act, could obtain an extension, and the possessor, as assignee of a future patent, could not. This, it is said, is unreasonable, and therefore it is argued that the words should be slightly altered, and the enactment read as if it had provided that any one who had obtained, or should thereafter obtain, letters patent, should be entitled to an extension. This would be a proper construction, and necessary to make the construction consistent with the first supposition, as meaning a patent for a new invention only; but if we act on the second supposition, and hold that these words mean to bring down by reference the words, "as grantee or assignee," or otherwise, and these words mean to include the assignee of the patent, there is no occasion for any alteration of the sentence, and inconsistency is obviated. The possessors by the assignment of an existing and of a future patent are both on one footing, and both entitled to petition for the prolongation of the term, and this is a good reason for admitting the construction of making the whole reasonable, without any alteration of the language. The ordinary sense of the words "obtaining which" alone would probably be taken to mean the original obtaining from the Crown, as we think explained by the context to mean the becoming possessed either by original grant, by assignment, or by any other title. We feel a difficulty in admitting the explanation of these words, "as assignee," given by some of the judges in the case of Spilsbury v. Clough (2 Gale & Davidson; 2 Q. B. 466). We suppose that they are meant to refer to an assignee of a borrowed invention, who obtains a patent here, for the assignee is distinguished from the grantee, and one who obtains letters patent as assignee is distinguished from the grantee, and must take by assignment the letters patent, not the invention. Besides, the proprietor, who is not necessarily the assignee of a foreign invention, and now seldom is, may have letters patent granted to him. The Act, it is true, is so penned as to leave the construction open to doubt; but our opinion is, that the power of renewal is not confined to grantees, but extends to assignees; and the legislature may reasonably be supposed to compensate the assignee as well as the patentee, for labour bestowed and capital expended, without adequate remuneration, in bringing a useful invention to perfection, as they certainly have done by a subsequent statute. It is no doubt true that the legislature have by that statute, 7 & 8 Vict. c. 69, s. 4, expressly extended the benefit of having a renewed patent to an assignee, and expressly confirmed existing terms, with an exception (in section 7), which applies to the present case; but this leaves the case as it stood before, and as this provision is not declaratory, it has no other effect than that of raising a surmise as to the opinion of the legislature as to the construction of the clause; but the province of the legislature is not to construe, but to enact; and their opinion, not expressed in the form of law, as a declaratory provision would be, is not binding on courts, whose duty it is to expound the statutes they have enacted. A strong instance is this, found in the case of Doe v. Grey (2 T. R.), which was referred to during the argument. This clause we consider to have been introduced for the sake of removing all doubt as to the title of an assignee to a renewed patent, leaving the question as to the title then in litigation exactly as it stood before. Our opinion, therefore, is, that the judgment ought not to be arrested, and that, on the whole, the plaintiff is entitled to succeed.

BRADBURNE v. BOTFIELD.

The rule laid down in James v. Emery, as to the construction of joint and several covenants, is the correct one, when taken with the qualification added by Mr. Preston.

The Court of Exchequer, in their judgment in Sorsbie v. Park (12 M. & W.), intended to lay down no doctrine at variance with that of Anderson v. Martindale, as supposed by the Court of Queen's Bench in Hopkinson v. Lee (14 L. J. 106, Q. B.; see 4 Law T. 395).

Quære, Whether one of several tenants in common, lessors could sue on a covenant with all?

Unthank, in support of the demurrer.

J. W. Smith, contrà.

The judgment fully explains the arguments and facts in this case.

JUDGMENT.

PARKE, B.—In this case a lease has been made of certain coal and iron mines to the defendant and others. By the indenture of demise, Sir Edward Vinnington and John Hay Addenbroke, who, as it appears by the recital, were seised in fee of an undivided fourth part of the demised property in trust for Mrs. Foley; Edward, Elizabeth, and Maria Foley, and Mary Whitby, who were seised in fee of another undivided fourth part; William Townsend, who was seised in fee of half; George Townsend and Sarah Townsend, who had equitable interests in that half, all joined in demising, according to their several and respective existing estates, rights, and interests in the tenements, to the defendants and others, yielding and paying certain rents to Edward Foley, Elizabeth and Maria Foley, Sir T. Winnington, John Hay Addenbroke, Mary Whitby, Sarah Townsend, and William Townsend respectively, and to their respective heirs and assigns, according to their several and respective estates, rights, and interests in the premises; and the defendant a[illegible] others did thereby covenant to and with Edward Foley, Elizabeth and Maria Foley, and each and every of them, their, and each and every of their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, in manner following; and the declaration proceeds to state covenants to repair the premises, the furnaces, and buildings, and to surrender in good repair to the lessors, their heirs and assigns respectively, at the end of the term, and to work mines properly, &c. It then deduces a title to William Townsend's moiety to the plaintiff, and alleges breaches. There is a plea which states John Hay Addenbroke to be the survivor of all the covenantees, and to this there is a demurrer, raising the question whether the covenants declared upon are covenants with all the parties demising, or are or may be treated as several covenants with the legal owners of each undivided part. When the argument upon the demurrer arose before us, we expressed our opinion that, on the face of the declaration, the covenants were such as all the covenantors or covenantees must have jointly sued upon, for the name of no one covenantor could have been rejected; there must be some covenant upon which all could sue; and all stated in the declaration were of the same character. If they related to the separate legal interest of such tenants in common, still the other covenantees must join, on the principle of the case of Anderson v. Martindale (1 East, 497). But it was suggested the lease ought to have been set out in oyer, and that, had it been so set out, it would have appeared that there were other covenants in gross, in which all must join; and then, the covenants running with the land, those declared on might be construed to be several covenants with each legal tenant; and the case stood over that we might be furnished with a copy of th[e] lease. On this being done, Mr. Unthank cited several authorities, establishing, as he contended, the proposition that this covenant declared upon might be treated as "several covenants," and the Court took time to look into these authorities. There is no occasion to refer to the cases as to the rule of construction as to covenants being joint or several, according to the interests of the parties, which rule is perfectly well established. In the case of Sorshie v. Park (12 M. & W. 146), Lord Abinger and myself, on referring to the established rule as laid down by Lord Chief Justice Gibbs, in the case of James v. Emery (8 Taunt. 245), approve of Mr. Preston's qualification and explanation of it, in his edition of Touchstone, 166; namely, that if the language of the covenant was capable of being so construed, it was to be taken to be joint or several, according to the interests of the parties to it. It is added by Mr. Preston, that the general rule proposed by Sir Vicary Gibbs, and to be found in several books, would establish that there was a rule of law too powerful to be controlled by any intention, however expressed. But the above qualification is perfectly correct, and is not at variance with any decided case, as it surely is competent for a person, by express joint words strong enough to make a joint covenant, to do one thing for the benefit of one of the covenantees and another for the benefit of another, as it is to make it joint where it is for the benefit of one. I mention this, because the Court of Queen's Bench, in the case of Hopkinson v. Lee (14 Law Journal, 106), have supposed that Lord Abinger and myself had sanctioned some doctrine at variance with the case of Anderson v. Martindale (1 East, 497), and Slingsby's case (5 Reports), which was far from my intention to do, it being now fully established. I conceive, by the cases, that one and the same covenant cannot be made both joint and several with the covenantors and covenantees. It is to be observed, a part of Mr. Preston's explanation is, that, by express words, a covenant may be joint and several to or with the covenantors or covenantees, notwithstanding the interests are several, is inaccurately expressed; it is true only of covenantors, and the case cited from Salkeld, 393, relates to them. Probably Mr. Preston intended no more. I never meant to assent to the doctrine that the same covenant might be made by any words, however strong, joint and several, where the interest was joint. And it is to this part I apprehend of Mr. Preston's doctrine, that the Court of Queen's Bench objects. I give this explanation in order that it may not be supposed that there is any difference on this point with the Court of Queen's Bench. We looked since the argument into the lease now set out in oyer, and into all the authorities cited for the plaintiff, and we still entertain the opinion that he cannot recover on the covenants stated in the declaration. It is impossible to remove the name of any covenantee, and all the covenantees must necessarily sue upon some covenant; and it appears to us there are no covenants in the lease of a joint nature, if those declared upon are not, or which would be in gross, if the person entitled to the legal estate had alone demised; for all relate to and affect the quality of the subject of the demise, or the mode of enjoying it, and could have been sued upon by the assignees of the reversion in such lease before breach. The covenant relied upon as being in gross was, that the lessors should be at liberty to use the ropes, &c. to descend into the mines, in a special covenant relating to the entry to view, and would, we think, go to the assignee of the reversion in such lease. If all the covenantees could not sue on the covenant declared upon, they could sue upon some; and therefore, in their lives, and after the death of any of them, the survivors are the proper plaintiffs. It is unnecessary to decide whether one of several tenants in common lessors could sue on a covenant with all to repair, as to which there is no decisive authority either way. The case of Kitchen v. Buckley (Sir Thomas Raymond, S. C. 1 Siderfin, 157, and Levens, 109) establish it as perfectly clear that all may sue. Our judgment must therefore be for the defendant.

Judgment for defendant.

Cap. XCVII.

An Act to amend the Law respecting Testamentary Dispositions of Property in the Public Funds, and to authorize the Payment of Dividends on Letters of Attorney in certain Cases. (August 4, 1845.)

1 Geo. 1, c. 19. All shares of public stocks standing in the books of the Bank of England in the name of any deceased person may be transferred by the executors notwithstanding any specific bequests. Bank may require all the executors to join in the transfer of stock.—Whereas by an Act passed in the first year of his late Majesty King George the First, intituled "An Act for raising Nine hundred and ten thousand Pounds for Public Services, by Sale of Annuities after the Rate of Five Pounds per Centum per Annum, redeemable by Parliament, and to authorize a Treaty concerning private Rights claimed by the Proprietors of the Sugar Houses in Scotland," and by divers Acts since passed for creating stocks, funds, and annuities payable out of the public revenue, and for the consolidation, regulation, and management of such stocks, funds, and annuities respectively, it is enacted, that any person or persons possessed of any estate or interest in the public stocks or funds, and annuities by the same Acts respectively created, may devise the same by will in writing, attested by two or more credible witnesses, but that no such devisee shall receive any payment thereupon until so much of any such will as shall relate to such stock or annuity respectively shall be entered or registered in the office of the chief accountant for the time being of the Governor and Company of the Bank of England, and that in default of any such devise such stocks or funds respectively, and the respective annuities attending the same, shall go to the executors or administrators of the person or persons dying entitled thereto: And whereas doubts have arisen as to the true construction and effect of the provisions aforesaid; and the registration of specific devises or bequests of property in such stocks, funds, and annuities as aforesaid has been found in practice to be unnecessary and inconvenient; and it is expedient that such doubts should be removed, and that the provisions made by the said Acts respectively for such registration should be repealed: And whereas it hath been the practice of the Governor and Company of the Bank of England to require that all the executors of any person entitled to any share or interest in any stocks, funds, or annuities transferable at the Bank of England, should join in the transfer thereof, and it is desirable that the same should be confirmed by law: be it therefore enacted and declared by the Queen's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, That all the share or interest in any public stocks now standing in the books of the Governor and Company of the Bank of England in the name of any deceased person, and all the share and interest of any person who shall hereafter die possessed of any such stocks standing in his name as aforesaid, shall and may be assigned and transferred by the executors or administrators of such person, notwithstanding any specific bequest or disposition thereof in the will of such person contained: provided always, that the said Governor and Company of the Bank of England shall not be required to permit or allow the executors or administrators of any such person to transfer any such stocks, or to receive any dividend thereon, until the probate of the will or the letters of administration of the goods, chattels, and credits of such person shall have been first left at the Bank of England for registration thereof; and that it shall be lawful for the said governor and company to require all the executors who shall have proved the will of any deceased person in whose name any such stocks are now or at any time hereafter may be standing to join and concur in every transfer thereof or of any part thereof.

2. Bank not to register specific bequests.—And be it enacted, That so much and such respective parts of any and every Act now in force as require all or any part of any will or codicil devising or bequeathing or purporting to devise or bequeath any estate, property, or interest in any public stocks, or in any dividends arising therefrom, to be entered or registered in the office of the chief accountant of the Governor and Company of the Bank of England, or in any other office, or in any book of the Governor and Company of the Bank of England, shall be and the same are hereby respectively repealed, and that from and after the passing of this Act it shall be sufficient for the said governor and company, before permitting the transfer of any stocks, or the receipt of any dividends upon any stock standing in the name of any deceased person, to register the names of the deceased party, and of his executors or administrators respectively, as the case may be.

3. Powers of attorney to be given for receipt of dividends in certain cases.—And whereas it frequently happens that stock is standing in the names of infants or persons of unsound mind, jointly with persons not under any legal disability to act, and such last-mentioned persons are not able to attend personally to receive the dividends thereon, and no power of attorney can be granted for the receipt of such dividends; be it therefore enacted, that whenever it shall happen that any stock shall be standing in the name of any infant or person of unsound mind, jointly with any person not under any legal disability to act, it shall be lawful to and for such last-mentioned person, by letter of attorney under his hand and seal, attested by two or more credible witnesses, to authorize some other person to receive the dividends due and to accrue due on such stock; and the payment of any such dividend to any person so appointed shall discharge the said Governor and Company of the Bank of England in respect thereof; provided always, that it shall be lawful for the said Governor and Company, before acting on any such letter of attorney, to require proof to the satisfaction of the said Governor and Company of the age of such infant, or of the unsoundness of ...ind of such persons, by the declaration of competent persons, to be made in pursuance of the Act passed in the sixth year of the reign of his late Majesty authorizing the substitution of a declaration in lieu of an oath in certain cases.

4. Interpretation of Act.—And be it enacted, that the word "stocks" in this Act shall extend to any stocks, funds, or annuities which now are or at any time hereafter shall be transferable at the Bank of England; and that the plural number in this Act shall be construed to include the singular; and that the masculine gender in this Act shall be construed to include the feminine.

Secs. 59 and 60 provide for certain medical case-books to be kept.

61. That every licensed house shall, without any previous notice, be visited by two at least of the commissioners (one of whom shall be a physician or surgeon, and the other a barrister) four times at the least in every year, if such house shall be within the immediate jurisdiction of the commissioners, and if not, twice at least in every year, and every hospital in which lunatics shall be received shall, without any previous notice, be visited by two at least of the said commissioners (one of whom shall be a physician or surgeon, and the other a barrister) once at least in every year; and every such visit shall be made on such day or days, and at such hours of the day, and for such length of time, as the visiting commissioners shall think fit, and also at such other times and days as the said commissioners in lunacy shall direct, and such visiting commissioners, when visiting such house or hospital, may and shall inspect every part of such house or hospital, and every outhouse, place, and building communicating with such house or hospital, or detached therefrom, but not separated by ground belonging to any other person, and every part of the ground or appurtenances held, used, or occupied therewith, and see every patient then confined in such house or hospital, and inquire whether any patient is under restraint, and why, and inspect the order and certificates or certificate for the reception of every patient who shall have been received into such house or hospital since the last visit of the commissioners, and in the case of any house licensed by justices shall consider the observations made in the visitors book for such house by the visitors appointed by the justices, and enter in the visitors book of such house or hospital a minute of the then condition of the house or hospital, and of the patients therein, and the number of patients under restraint, with the reasons thereof, as stated, and such irregularity (if any) as may exist in any such order or certificates as aforesaid, and also whether the previous suggestions (if any) of the visiting commissioners or visitors have or have not been attended to, and any observations which they may deem proper as to any of the matters aforesaid or otherwise, and also, if such visit be the first after the granting a license to the house, shall examine such license, and, if the same be in conformity with the provisions of this Act, sign the same, but if it be informal, enter in such visitors book in what respect such license is informal: provided also, that it shall be lawful for the Lord Chancellor, on a representation by the commissioners setting forth the expediency of such alteration, by any writing under his hand, to direct that any house licensed by justices shall (during such period as he shall therein specify, or until such his direction shall be revoked) be visited by the commissioners once only in the year, and also to direct that any house licensed by the commissioners, and not receiving any pauper patients therein, shall (during such period as he shall therein specify, or until such his direction shall be revoked) be visited by the commissioners twice only in the year.

Sec. 62 enacts that licensed houses, not within the immediate jurisdiction of the commissioners, are to be inspected four times a year at least by the visitors.

Secs. 63 to 69 relate to the visits and inquiries of the visiting commissioners.

70. That it shall be lawful for the commissioners, or any five of them, at any quarterly or special meeting, by any resolution or resolutions under their common seal, or to be entered in a book to be kept for that purpose, and signed by five at least of the commissioners present at such meeting, from time to time to make such orders and rules as they shall think fit for regulating the duties of the commissioners or any of them, or of their secretary, clerks, and servants, or for the due or better performance of the business of the commission: provided nevertheless, that the secretary of the commissioners shall give to every commissioner, so far as circumstances will admit, not less than seven days' notice of every such special meeting, and shall in the summons for such special meeting state the purposes for which the same is intended to be held.

Sec. 71 gives power in certain cases to visit by night.

Sec. 72. The person who signed the order for the reception of a private patient may order his discharge or removal.

73. That if the person who signed the order on which any patient (not being a pauper) was received into any licensed house or into any hospital be incapable by reason of insanity or absence from England, or otherwise, of giving an order for the discharge or removal of such patient, or if such person be dead, then and in any of such cases the husband or wife of such patient, or if there be no such husband or wife, the father of such patient, or if there be no father, the mother of such patient, or if there be no mother, then any one of the nearest of kin for the time being of such patient, or the person who made the last payment on account of such patient, may by any writing under his or her hand give such direction as aforesaid for the discharge or removal of such patient, and thereupon such patient shall be forthwith discharged or removed as the person giving such direction shall direct.

74. That the guardians of any parish or union may by a minute of their board, or an officiating clergyman of any parish not under a board of guardians, and one of the overseers thereof, or any two justices of the county or borough in which such last-mentioned parish is situate, may by writing under the hands respectively of such clergyman and overseer or of such justices direct that any pauper patient belonging to such parish or union, and detained in any licensed house or any hospital, shall be discharged or removed therefrom, and may direct the mode of such discharge or removal; and if a copy of such minute or such writing be produced to the proprietor or superintendent of such licensed house or such hospital, he shall forthwith discharge or remove such patient, or cause or suffer such patient to be discharged or removed accordingly.

Sec. 75 provides that no patient be removed under any of the preceding powers, if certified to be dangerous, unless the commissioners or visitors consent, or for the purpose of transfer to some other asylum.

Sec. 76 enacts that commissioners may discharge any patient confined in a house licensed by themselves.

Sec. 77. That two commissioners may make special visits to discharge any patient confined in a house licensed by justices or in an hospital.

Sec. 78 gives similar powers for two visitors as to houses within their jurisdiction.

79. That every such order by any commissioners or visitors for the discharge of a patient from any house licensed by justices, or from any hospital, shall be signed by them, and that each of such special visits shall be by the same commissioners or visitors; and that it shall not be lawful for such commissioners or visitors to order the discharge of any patient from any such last-mentioned house or hospital without having previously, if the medical attendant of such house or hospital shall have tendered himself for that purpose, examined him as to his opinion respecting the fitness of such patient to be discharged; and if such commissioners or visitors shall, after so examining such medical attendant, discharge such patient, and such medical attendant shall furnish them with any statement in writing containing his reasons against the discharge of such patient, they shall forthwith transmit such statement to the commissioners or to the clerk of the visitors, as the case may require, to be kept and registered in a book for that purpose.

80. That not less than seven days shall intervene between the first and second of such special visits; and that such commissioners or visitors shall, seven days previously to the second of such special visits, give notice thereof, either by post or by an entry in the patients book, to the proprietor or superintendent of the house licensed by justices or of the hospital in which the patient intended to be visited is detained; and that such proprietor or superintendent shall forthwith, if possible, transmit by post a copy of such notice, in the case of a patient not being a pauper, to the person by whose authority such patient was received into such house, or by whom the last payment on account of such patient was made, and in the case of a pauper, to the guardians of his parish or union, or if there be no such guardians, to one of the overseers for the time being of his parish, and also in the case of any patient detained in a house licensed by justices, to the clerk of the visitors of such house.

Sec. 81. The preceding powers not to extend to persons found lunatic by inquisition, or confined under authority of Secretary of State.

Sec. 82 gives power for visitors and visiting commissioners to regulate the dietary of pauper patients.

83. That if any person shall apply to any visitor in order to be informed whether any particular person is confined in any licensed house within the jurisdiction of such visitor, the said visitor, if he shall think it reasonable to permit such inquiry to be made, shall sign an order to the clerk of the visitors, and the said clerk shall, on receipt of such order, and on payment to him of a sum not exceeding seven shillings for his trouble, make search amongst the returns made to him in pursuance of this Act whether the person inquired after is or has been within the then last twelve calendar months confined in any licensed house within the jurisdiction of such visitor; and if it shall appear that such person is or has been so confined, the said clerk shall deliver to the person so applying a statement in writing, specifying the situation of the house in which the person so inquired after appears to be or to have been confined, and of the name of the proprietor or resident superintendent thereof, and also the date of the admission of such person into such licensed house, and (in case of his having been removed or discharged) the date of his removal or discharge therefrom.

84. That if any person shall apply to any commissioner in order to be informed whether any particular person is confined in any licensed house, or in any hospital, asylum, or other place by this Act made subject to the visitation of the commissioners, such commissioner, if he shall think it reasonable to permit such inquiry to be made, shall sign an order to the secretary of the commissioners, and the secretary shall, on the receipt of such order, and on payment to him of a sum not exceeding seven shillings (to be applied as hereinbefore provided), make search amongst the returns made in pursuance of this Act, or of any of the Acts hereby repealed, whether the person inquired after is or has been within the last twelve calendar months confined in any house, hospital, asylum, or place by this Act made subject to the visitation of the commissioners; and if it shall appear that such person is or has been so confined, the secretary shall deliver to the person so applying a statement in writing, specifying the situation of the house, hospital, asylum, or place in which the person so inquired after appears to be or to have been confined, and also (so far as the said secretary can ascertain the same from any register or return in his possession) the name of the proprietor, superintendent, or principal officer of such house, hospital, asylum, or place, and also the date of the admission of such person into such licensed house, hospital, asylum, or other place, and (in case of his having been removed or discharged) the date of his removal or discharge therefrom.

85. That it shall be lawful for any one of the commissioners, as to patients confined in any house, hospital, or other place (not being a gaol) hereby authorized to be visited by the commissioners, and also for any one of the visitors of any licensed house as to patients confined in such house, at any time to give an order in writing under the hand of such one commissioner or visitor for the admission to any patient of any relation or friend of such patient (or of any medical or other person whom any relation or friend of such patient shall desire to be admitted to him), and such order of admission may be either for a single admission, or for an admission for any limited number of times, or for admission generally at all reasonable times, and either with or without any restriction as to such admission or admissions being in the presence of a keeper or not, or otherwise; and if the proprietor or superintendent of any such house, hospital, or place shall refuse admission to, or shall prevent or obstruct the admission to any patient of, any relation, friend, or other person who shall produce such order of admission as aforesaid, he shall for every such refusal, prevention, or obstruction forfeit a sum not exceeding twenty pounds.

Sec. 86 empowers proprietor or superintendent, with consent of two commissioners or visitors, to take or send a patient to any place for his health.

Sec. 87. In case of the removal of a patient, or of his escape and recapture within fourteen days, the original order for his reception to remain in force.

Sec. 88. Commissioners must report to the Lord Chancellor periodically.

Sec. 89 constitutes the private committee.

90. That no person (unless he be a person who derives no profit from the charge, or a committee appointed by the Lord Chancellor) shall receive to board or lodge in any house, other than an hospital registered under this Act, or an asylum, or a house licensed under this Act, or under one of the Acts hereinbefore repealed, or take the care or charge of any one patient as a lunatic or alleged lunatic, without the like order and medical certificates in respect of such patient as are hereinbefore required on the reception of a patient (not being a pauper) into a licensed house; and that every person (except a person deriving no profit from the charge, or a committee appointed by the Lord Chancellor) who shall receive to board or lodge in any unlicensed house, not being a registered hospital or an asylum, or take the care or charge of any one patient as a lunatic or alleged lunatic, shall, within seven clear days after so receiving or taking such patient, transmit to the secretary of the commissioners a true and perfect copy of the order and medical certificates on which such patient has been so received, and a statement of the date of such reception, and of the situation of the house into which such patient has been received, and of the Christian and surname and occupation of the occupier thereof and of the person by whom the care and charge of such patient has been taken; and every such patient shall at least once in every two weeks be visited by a physician, surgeon, or apothecary not deriving, and not having a partner, father, son, or brother who derives, any profit from the care or charge of such patient; and such physician, surgeon, or apothecary shall enter in a book, to be kept at the house or hospital for that purpose, to be called "The Medical Visitation Book," the date of each of his visits, and a statement of the condition of the patient's health, both mental and bodily, and of the condition of the house in which such patient is, and such book shall be produced to the visiting commissioner on every visit, and shall be signed by him as having been so produced; and the person by whom the care or charge of such patient has been taken, or into whose house he has been received as aforesaid, shall transmit to the secretary of the commissioners the same notices and statements of the death, removal, escape, and re-capture of such lunatic, and within the same periods, as are hereinbefore required in the case of the death, removal, escape, and re-capture of a patient (not being a pauper) received into a licensed house; and that every person who shall receive into an unlicensed house, not being a registered hospital nor an asylum, or take the care or charge of any person therein as a lunatic, without first having such order and medical certificates as aforesaid, or who, having received any such patient, shall not within the several periods aforesaid transmit to the secretary of the commissioners such copy, statement, and notices as aforesaid, or shall fail to cause such patient to be so visited by a medical attendant as aforesaid, and every such medical attendant who shall make an untrue entry in the said Medical Visitation Book, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.

91. That the secretary to the commissioners shall preserve every copy transmitted as aforesaid of the order and certificates for the reception of any patient as a lunatic into an unlicensed house, and every statement and notice which may be transmitted to such secretary with respect to any such patient as aforesaid, and shall enter the same (in such form as the private committee shall direct) in a book to be kept for that purpose, to be called "The Private Register," and such private register shall be kept by such secretary in his own custody, and shall be inspected only by the members for the time being of the said private committee, and by such other persons as the Lord Chancellor shall by writing under his hand appoint.

Sec. 92 empowers members of the private committee to visit unlicensed houses receiving a single patient and report.

Sec. 93. The Lord Chancellor, on such report and the representation of the private committee, may order a lunatic to be removed.

Sec. 94. Commissioners to report if property of lunatics be not duly protected or applied.

Sec. 95 provides that the Lord Chancellor shall direct the Master in Lunacy to report as to the lunacy of any person detained as a lunatic, and to appoint guardians of his person and estate, and direct the application of his income; but the Lord Chancellor may still issue a commission de lunatico inquirendo.

Secs. 96 to 98 relate to Masters in Lunacy, and orders and regulations, fees to be fixed by Lord Chancellor, and payment of Master's expenses.

99. That every proprietor and superintendent of a licensed house or registered hospital, and every other person hereby or by any of the Acts hereinbefore repealed authorized to receive or take charge of a lunatic upon an order, and who shall receive or has received a proper order, in pursuance of this Act or any of the said repealed Acts, accompanied with the required medical certificates or certificate, for the reception or taking charge of any person as a lunatic, and the assistants and servants of such proprietor, superintendent, or other person, shall have power and authority to take charge of, receive, and detain such patient until he shall die, or be removed or discharged by due authority, and in case of the escape at any time or times of such patient, to retake him at any time within fourteen days after such escape, and again to detain him as aforesaid; and in every writ, indictment, information, action, and other proceeding which shall be preferred or brought against any such proprietor, superintendent, or other person authorized as aforesaid, or against any assistant or servant of any such proprietor, superintendent, or authorized person, for taking, confining, detaining, or retaking any person as a lunatic, the party complained of may plead such order and certificates or certificate in defence to any such writ, indictment, information, action, or other proceeding as aforesaid, and such order and certificates or certificate shall, as respects such party, be a justification for taking, confining, detaining, or retaking such lunatic or alleged lunatic.

100. That it shall be lawful for the commissioners, or any two of them, and also for the visitors of any licensed house, or any two of such visitors, from time to time, as they shall see occasion, to require, by summons under the common seal of the commission, if by the commissioners, and if by two only of the commissioners or by two visitors, then under the hands and seals of such two commissioners or two visitors as the case may be (according to the form in schedule (I) annexed to this Act, or as near thereto as the case will permit), any person to appear before them to testify on oath the truth touching any matters respecting which such commissioners and visitors respectively are by this Act authorized to inquire (which oath such commissioners or visitors are hereby empowered to administer); and every person who shall not appear before such commissioners or visitors pursuant to such summons, or shall not assign some reasonable excuse for not so appearing, or shall appear and refuse to be sworn or examined, shall, on being convicted thereof before one of her Majesty's justices for the county or borough within which the place at which such person shall have been by such summons required to appear and give evidence is situate, shall for every such neglect or refusal forfeit a sum not exceeding fifty pounds.

101. That it shall be lawful for any commissioners or visitors who shall summon any person to appear and give evidence as aforesaid to direct the secretary of the commissioners or the clerk of such visitors, as the case may be, to pay to such person all reasonable expenses of his appearance and attendance in pursuance of such summons, the same to be considered as expenses incurred by such commissioners and visitors respectively in the execution of this Act, and to be taken into account and paid accordingly.

102. That every complaint or information of or for any offence against this Act, where any pecuniary penalty is hereby imposed (except when hereby otherwise provided for), may be made before one justice; and when any person shall be charged upon oath before a justice for any such offence against this Act, such justice may summon the person charged to appear at a time and place to be named in such summons, and if he shall not appear accordingly, and upon proof of the due service of the summons (either personally or by leaving the same at his last or usual place of abode), any two justices may either proceed to hear and determine the case, or may issue their warrant for apprehending such person and bringing him before any two justices; and any two justices shall and may, upon the appearing of such person pursuant to such summons, or upon such person being apprehended with such warrant, or upon the non-appearance of such person, hear the matter of every such complaint or information, and make any such determination thereon as such justices shall think proper; and, upon conviction of any person such justices may, if they shall think fit, reduce the amount of the penalty by this Act imposed for such offence to any sum not less than one fourth of the amount thereof, and shall and may issue a warrant under their hands and seals for levying such penalty or reduced penalty, and all costs and charges of such summons, warrant, and hearing, and all incidental costs and charges, by distress and sale of the goods and chattels of the person so convicted; and it shall be lawful for any such two justices to order any person so convicted to be detained and kept in the custody of any constable or other peace officer until return can be conveniently made to such warrant of distress, unless the said offender shall give security, to the satisfaction of such justices, by way of recognizance or otherwise, for his appearance before such justices on such day as shall be appointed for the return of such warrant of distress, such day not being more than seven days from the time of taking any such security; but if upon the return of such warrant of distress it shall appear that no sufficient distress can be had whereupon to levy the said penalty and such costs and charges as aforesaid, and the same shall not be forthwith paid, or in case it shall appear to the satisfaction of such justices, either by the confession of the offender or otherwise, that the offender hath not sufficient goods and chattels whereupon the said penalty, costs, and charges may be levied, such justices shall and may, by warrant under their hands and seals, commit such offender to the common gaol or house of correction for any term not exceeding three calendar months, unless such penalty, and all such costs and charges as aforesaid, shall be sooner paid; and all such penalties, when recovered, shall be paid, when the complaint or information shall be laid or brought by, or by the direction of, the commissioners, to the secretary of the commissioners, to be by him applied and accounted for as hereinbefore directed with respect to moneys received for licenses granted by the commissioners; and when the complaint or information shall be laid or brought by the direction of any visitors, to the clerk of the peace for the county or borough, to be by him applied and accounted for as hereinbefore directed with respect to moneys received for licenses granted by the justices of such county or borough; and the overplus (if any) arising from such distress and sale, after payment of the penalty, and all costs and charges as aforesaid, shall be paid, upon demand, to the owner of the goods and chattels so distrained.

103. That the justices before whom any person shall be convicted of any offence against this Act for which a pecuniary penalty is imposed may cause the conviction to be drawn up in the following form, or in any other form to the same effect, as the case may require; and that no conviction under this Act shall be void through want of form:

THE MAGISTRATE.

Summary.

There is so much of truth, of wholesome though bitter truth, in the following remarks contained in an article in the Spectator, and it is so desirable that the discontinuance of a system of convict government at Norfolk Island, which, based on good sense, was found to work well, should be widely known, that we transcribe them with pleasure to our columns.

TRANSPORTATION.

Never a day passes but something in the papers shews the great humanity of the English heart. If a cheap schoolmaster beat a boy, sent to him because incorrigible at home, or if a policeman insist somewhat harshly on taking a disorderly girl to the station-house, a host of indignant advocates of all classes, from noblemen downwards, are found ready to do battle for the sufferers and to enlist the sympathies of reporters and police magistrates. But our humanity, like our friendship, usually requires the presence of its object; it lacks the spirituality that annihilates space. We all know very well that at the Antipodes, where they have been sent to be out of the way, exists a mighty congregation of human beings, speaking our own language, bearing familiar names, and still remembering our towns and villages and old-world customs, towards whom, sunk as they were in the depths of crime, we were bound to exercise such benevolence as man can afford his fellow in time of greatest need. We all know, too, how this duty has been performed; how we have demoralized these very felons, annihilating every vestige of the better nature that rendered them akin to us, and causing the "hearts of beasts" to lodge within them in place of the "hearts of men." And not only is there no cry raised on behalf of these miserable beings, but, with the fact of their condition broadly admitted, new ship-loads of those who, in comparison, may be spoken of as uncontaminated, are sent out [mo]nth after month to be absorbed in the corrupt[ion]. This is the effect of mere indifference, and not of any doubt as to the possibility of a better course. There is scarcely a man among the active spirits of the middle and lower classes but could tell us that the system adopted in our penal colonies must necessarily fail. It is founded in the same ignorance of human nature, or at least of the aberrations of human nature, as that which for centuries maintained the unglazed cell, the chain, and the strait-waistcoat, as the appropriate lodging and apparatus for the insane. Hanwell and its results have settled the question betwixt physical and moral force, and the only reliance of the advocates of the old system must now be on the apathy of mankind. An experiment, in fact, equally startling with that of Hanwell, and promising a like success, is known to have taken place, not long back, at Norfolk Island. The plans adopted on that occasion have been detailed in several papers printed for private circulation by Captain Maconochie, the superintendent; but although they develope a system which at once strikes the reason as calculated to form an universal basis for criminal discipline, they appear to have been suffered to drop, probably from a want of courage on the part of the home authorities to adopt them on a comprehensive scale. The chief feature of the system is the substitution of a labour-sentence for a time-sentence; thus giving a constant incentive to industry, since, in such case, a step towards freedom is the reward of every toil. It requires that for the amount of labour performed from day to day a proportionate number of marks should be given, and that an accumulation of a certain number of these marks should entitle the labourer to freedom—a substitution, in fact, of work performed with all the ardour of a strong motive for that which is now obtained, or sought to be obtained, by a merely coercive system, depressing (as slavery in any form always must be) to every moral and physical power. At the same [time,] in order to place the convict entirely in a position to prevent his returning to the world before he has acquired su[ffici]ent self-control, it is a condition that for every article of food or luxury supplied payment is to be received from him in marks; a forfeiture of marks [is] also a consequence of misconduct; so that just in proportion as he may prove improvident and unable to resist ordinary temptations, will the time of his restraint be lengthened. That these plans are sound in principle will readily be seen; and the knowledge that, as far as tested, they have been successful in practice, m[ust th]row a heavy reproach on those [wh]o permit th[e] present system to continue. It is not denied in any quarter that this system inevitably results in degrading even the worst that come within its scope, and none will contend but that the accountability for the additional depravity thus engendered must rest with its upholders and not with its victims. "And because," says Jeremy Taylor, "very many sins are sins of society and confederation, it is a hard and weighty consideration what shall become of those who have tempted a brother or sister to sin and death."

Regulations for Transportation.—In the last report of the Inspectors of Millbank prison, the following information is afforded on the subject of transportation:—After a careful personal examination of the prisoners, and of the documents transmitted with them, the inspectors recommend such disposal with reference to the age, crime, sentence, and previous convictions of each prisoner, as is in accordance with the general principles of the system of convict discipline which has been established by Lord Stanley in the penal colonies, under which the convicts have to pass through certain stages of detention and discipline before they become free. The following is an outline of the mode of disposal of male transports under the instructions of the Secretary of State:—Adult male prisoners sentenced to transportation for life; the more aggravated cases of convicts sentenced for any term not less than 15 years; all prisoners sentenced to transportation for any term for burglary, arson, rape, forgery, or for robberies attended with personal violence; and prisoners sentenced to transportation for any offence or term who have been previously transported—are sent to Norfolk Island for terms of not less than two nor more than four years. After the prescribed period of detention in Norfolk Island, they have to pass through certain terms in Van Diemen's Land, first in the probationary gang, afterwards as probation pass-holders, and, finally, as holders of tickets of leave before they obtain their freedom. Other adult male prisoners, with the exception of those selected for Pentonville prison, are sent to Van Diemen's Land for a term of detention in the probationary gangs of not less than one year, nor, except in cases of misconduct, of more than two [years;] these prisoners afterwards pass through the stages of probationary pass and ticket of leave holders before they obtain their freedom. It appears that other prisoners are sent to Gibraltar and Bermuda and Pentonville prison before they are sent to the Australian colonies or Van Diemen's Land; others, who are unfit for active labour, to the invalid hulk at Woolwich. Juvenile male prisoners under sentence of transportation, who are deemed fit subjects, are sent to Parkhurst prison, and the remainder are sent to Point Puer, in Van Diemen's Land, where there is an establishment for convict boys.

The New Metropolitan Asylums.—At a special meeting of the Vestry of Marylebone, on Saturday last, it was determined to uphold the guardians in resisting the orders of the Poor-law Commissioners.

The following buildings have been duly registered for the solemnization of marriages, pursuant to the Act of the 6 & 7 Wm. 4, c. 85:—The English Wesleyan Chapel, situated at Chapel-street, in the parish of St. Peter, in the county of the borough of Carmarthen, in the district of Carmarthen Union. All that we have of interest this week to offer will be found below. We invite attention to the subjoined Note on Leading Cases, which will be found of practical value.

LEADING CASES.—No. X.

Carr v. Smith.

(5 Q. B. 128.)

What actions lie at law by a partner against his co-partner—The action of account.

"It is a general rule," observes Abbott, C. J. in Bovill v. Hammond (5 B. & C. 151), "that between partners, whether they are so in general or for a particular transaction only, no account can be taken at law;" and the observance of this rule is rendered necessary by reason of the difficulty which would attend the adjustment of complicated accounts, and, in fact, the impossibility of explaining them to a jury in a clear and satisfactory manner, and likewise, because it is extremely important, on account of the confidence usually reposed by partners in each other, that the truth should be elicited by an examination upon oath, which can only be effected in a court of equity.

It must be borne in mind, however, that the above general rule applies only where the partnership has been actually formed and set a going (per Holroyd, J. 3 B. & C. 823), and that there is a marked distinction between an actual partnership and an inchoate right of partnership; the reason which dictated the rule in the former case not holding in the latter; and this distinction is peculiarly important to be observed at the present time, when so many trading companies and partnerships on an extensive scale are either in course of formation or actually established and perfected. Whether in any given case the defence that a partnership existed can be successfully maintained, will depend on the facts submitted, and may often be a question of no very easy solution. (See Fox v. Frith, 10 M. & W. 131, 136.) A person may have acquired the right to become a partner in an undertaking, and yet may never have enforced that right, as by paying the preliminary instalment, by signing the partnership deed, or by the performance of any other act constituting a condition precedent to the assumption by him of the character, the rights and liabilities of a partner.

Having in any given case satisfied ourselves that the defendant really is a co-partner with plaintiff, it will, in the next place, be advisable to consider what are the exceptions to the general rule above laid down, and whether the particular case falls within any one of such exceptions. Now it seems quite clear, that if there be an express covenant or special agreement between partners independent of the partnership accounts, an action will be maintainable in a court of law upon such covenant or agreement. Thus an action will lie on a covenant in co-partnership articles by one partner to pay another a certain sum if the partnership assets should prove deficient, and a special count in assumpsit will lie on a contract for the payment of instalments from time to time between parties similarly situated. (Brown v. Tapscott, 6 M. & W. 119, per Parke, B. id. 123; Bedford v. Brutton, 1 B. N. C. 399.) "There are," said Lord Ellenborough, C. J. in Venning v. Leckie (13 East, 8), "many deeds of copartnership in which the partners covenant each to advance a certain sum at first; and can it be said that no action would lie by one to enforce that covenant against another, because there are accounts between the afterwards which require unravelling in a court of equity?" Both from this passage and from other cases which will be found in the books, it is evident that a court of law will be reluctant to drive partners into equity when it can itself administer effectual relief, by awarding damages for a breach of contract altogether independent of the current partnership accounts.

There are likewise many authorities to shew that an action will lie on a final balance of accounts struck between partners; and a state of circumstances may exist in which a debt arising out of partnership transactions may be due to and recoverable by one partner from his co-partner. (Per Lord Abinger, C.B. Worrall v. Grayson, 1 M.&W. 168.) In Jackson v. Stopherd (2 Cr. & M. 361), which is usually cited with reference to this branch of our subject, A and B had entered into partnership to work a coal-mine, and after the coal-mine had been worked out and the coal-pit filled up, A said he would join in no more coal-pits, and A and B agreed to divide the materials and utensils used for working the coal-mine, taking each an article alternately, until the whole had been divided according to a valuation to be made. After the valuation had been made, however, B agreed to take the whole at such valuation, and accordingly took possession thereof. It was held that A had an immediate right of action for a moiety of the value of the materials and utensils. "Upon the general rule of law," observed Bayley, B. in this case, "there is no difficulty. One partner cannot maintain an action for a balance on the partnership account until the accounts have been settled and adjusted, and until it is ascertained what is the balance due from the partner against whom the claim is made. But there may be special bargains, by which particular transactions are insulated and separated from the winding up of the concern, and are taken out of the general law of partnership. When we consider the circumstances of this case, the plaintiff's right of action may be put upon the footing of a separate transaction;" and Vaughan, B. remarked thus: "It is no doubt a general rule, that one partner cannot maintain an action on a partnership transaction so long as the partnership concerns remain unadjusted; but if any subject be withdrawn, and made the foundation of a distinct settlement, it is then no objection that other accounts remain unadjusted." (See also Wray v. Milestone, 5 M. & W. 21.) In Carr v. Smith, which we have placed at the head of these remarks, the proprietors of a stage-coach arranged amongst themselves that each should horse the coach for certain stages, and receive the payments and make the requisite disbursements on such stages. The practice appeared to be for one or more of the partners every month to make up and send round to the other partners a written account from the way-bills, shewing the receipts and disbursements of each proprietor, the share of net profits, if any, due to each, and also the proprietors by and to whom the ascertained shares should be paid; and, according to this written account so made up, the payments were regularly made. In assumpsit by one partner against another for a balance so adjusted and not paid, the partnership still continuing, the plaintiff rested his case upon a written account made out as above. After verdict for the plaintiff, the defendant moved, pursuant to leave reserved, to enter a nonsuit, on this ground, amongst others, that a claim could not be maintained by one partner against his co-partner on a single adjustment of accounts made as above stated during the continuance of the partnership, inasmuch as such claim could not be conclusive while the partnership was [illegible]. For the plaintiff, it was contended in answer to this objection, that a statement which is final quoad the accounts stated, is a good ground of action, as much as if the whole partnership was at an end. The point here raised was not decided by the Court in banc, but Lord Denman, C. J. in delivering judgment, remarked as follows:—"The case of Fromont v. Coupland (2 Bing. 170), and other similar [illegible] seem to limit the action to a settlement of accounts [illegible] final close of all partnership transaction [illegible] but thi[illegible] de[illegible] [nec]essarily raise that question, for [illegible] all events, the settlement, in order to ground [an] action, must be one which is b[illegible] and conclusive upon the partners." The above passage from his lordship's judgment certainly favours the position that a court of law will only assist in enforcing the payment of a final balance, and that a court of equity is the tribunal to which resort should be had in other [illegible]. We may observe that, in Brierley v. Cripps (7 C. & P. 709), although an action was held to be maintainable for a balance of accounts, the pra[ctice] being to strike such balances monthly, yet in that case the balances were kept quite distinct from each other, and were not carried forwards so as to form a running account, whereas in Fromont v. Coupland, where the accounts were made up weekly, they must be taken to have been, as remarked by Burrough, J. "only preparatory to a final account." Perhaps the distinction here noticed will go far towards reconciling the different decisions on this subject with each other, and with that qualification of the general rule which obtains in the case of a transaction which has been by special agreement insulated and separated from the current partnership concerns.

The preceding observations will suffice to direct the reader's attention to the nature of the exceptions engrafted on the legal rule respecting the right to sue on partnership accounts and transactions. We must further remark that, where the partnership has terminated prior to the commencement of the action on a contract, it is necessary to ascertain whether such contract was first entered into between the plaintiff and [illegible] during the continuance of the partnership, or after it had ceased, since in the former case only [illegible] the defence which we have been considering available. Without attempting to lay down rules which may guide to a right conclusion on this subject, we shall merely call to mind that the question whether or not the partnership exists as between the original parties thereto, is quite distinct from the question whether it so exists with respect to third parties; with the latter question [illegible] have now no [conc]ern, and with reference to the former we shall only observe that it must be answered after a careful consideration of the peculiar facts which may appear in evidence. In the case of a public company, attention must especially be paid to the provisions of the deed of settlement, and to such resolutions as may have been passed at any meeting held for the avowed purpose of dissolving the company. The mere fact that the process of winding up the company's affairs has been intrusted to the directors, and that for this purpose they have found it necessary partially, at least, to continue the business, will not per se prevent the partnership from having ceased and terminated in the eye of the law quoad the other shareholders. (Lyon v. Haynes, 6 Scott, N. R. 371, 409.)

In the course of the preceding remarks we have not referred to one remedy at common law, which, although in practice almost obsolete, is still available at suit of a partner against his co-partner; that, viz. by action of account. "The proceedings in this action," it is observed in Bacon's Abr. title Accompt, "being difficult, dilatory, and expensive, it is now seldom used, especially if the party have other remedy, as debt, covenant, case, or if the demand be of consequence, and the matter of an intricate nature, for in such case it is now advisable to resort to a court of equity, where matters of accompt are more commodiously adjusted, and determined more advantageously for both parties." An instance in which the action of account seems, however, to have been an effectual remedy, and one attended with more expedition than proceedings in equity, occurs in Godfrey v. Saunders (3 Wils. 94), where we are assured that the plaintiff, before bringing this action, had exhibited his bill in Chancery against the defendant for an account, which had been "fruitlessly depending there for more than twelve years," and where it appears that the matter was finally determined by an action of account in [a] comparatively short period of two years, which circumstance occasioned the then Chief Justice, Wilmot, to express his satisfaction that such form of action was revived in the Court of Common Pleas, over which he presided. The proceedings in this action will be found explained in Bacon's Abr. title Accompt, and the curious reader may also refer to Wheeler v. Horne (Willes, 208), and to the very recent case of Sturton v. Richardson (13 M. & W. 17), which was an action of account by one tenant in common against his co-tenant, charging him as bailiff under the statute 4 & 5 Anne, c. 16, s. 27, and in which Alderson, B. expressed an opinion very different from that of Wilmot, C. J. above noticed. "The action," says his lordship, "is so inconvenient that it has been long discontinued, and parties have gone into a court of equity in preference;" and according to Mr. Chitty, in his work on the General Practice of the Law, vol. i. 869, "Although between joint tenants and tenants in common, an action of account at law is sustainable, yet a court of equity has a more perfect jurisdiction by compelling discovery on oath, and avoiding the difficulty and delay where the account comes before auditors in an action of account." (See also the note to Smith v. Smith, 2 Chitt. R. 10; Bull. N. P. 127.) We may remark, in conclusion, that although the common remedy, where an account has been stated, is by an action of assumpsit on such account (Foster v. Allanson, 2 T. R. 479), and although this remedy, as we have seen, is in some cases available by a partner against his co-partner, yet where no account has been made up, the only remedy at common law (or under the stat. of Anne) is by the action of account. The writ in this action commands the defendant to render a just account to the plaintiff, or shew the Court good cause to the contrary, and the judgment is twofold, 1st, that the plaintiff do account before auditors appointed by the Court; and 2ndly, when such account has been taken, that the defendant do pay to the plaintiff the amount of the balance thus ascertained to be due from the former to the latter. (See 3 Bl. Com. 164.)

A note of Carr v. Smith may be made in Chitt. jun. on Contracts, 3rd ed. 236, 238.

DECISIONS ON THE SMALL DEBTS ACT.

The commissioners sitting at Basinghall-street have not yet exercised the coercive powers with which they have been invested under the recent Act, by ordering any party to be committed to prison. During the past fortnight several orders were made by Mr. [illegible] Fonblanque, directing the payment of [sm]all [sums] by instalments. Several summonses [retu]rnable before the learned Commissioner fell to the ground because the parties at whose instances they issued were not able to effect a personal service upon the debtors. In one of those cases, it was strongly pressed upon the commissioner that the Act of Parliament did not in express terms require a personal service of the summons, and that it ought to be considered sufficient if the summons was left at the residence of the debtor with some member of his family. The learned commissioner, however, was [illegible]lly of opinion, that as disobedience to the summons was followed by a committal to prison, by analogy to the practice of the courts of common law in cases of attachment, proof of personal service of the summons could not be dispensed with, in any case in which the debtor did not appear; if he held otherwise, it might happen that a party would be committed to gaol for disobeying a summons he had never seen or heard of.

All the applications made to the commissioners hitherto, with a single exception, have proceeded upon judgments obtained in the superior courts. In the solitary instance adverted to, an application was made to Mr. Commissioner Fane for a summons, upon an order made under the City of London Court of Requests Act, for payment of a sum not exceeding two pounds. The officer of the Court of Requests attended with the books of the court, containing an entry of the order made by the Court. The learned commissioner, however, after looking into the Act of Parliament under which the court is constituted, declined to issue any summons. He thought that the recent Act, 8 & 9 Vict. c. 127, only gave him jurisdiction when an order was made by "a court of competent jurisdiction." In looking into the London Court of Requests Act, he observed that the court had a very special jurisdiction, and that many cases were expressly excepted from that jurisdiction. He could not safely assume that a Court of Requests might not have made an order in a case in which it was not competent for such court to adjudicate, and without entering fully into the details of the case he could not say whether the present case did or did not fall within any of the exceptions pointed out by the Act. Upon these grounds, he refused the application for a summons.—Legal Observer.

LEGAL INTELLIGENCE.

Westminster Court of Requests.—On Wednesday a general meeting of the Commissioners of the Westminster Court of Requests was summoned, for the purpose of considering the fees to be paid to the newly-elected assessor. The 19th section of the Act, which regulates the Court (6 & 7 Wm. 4, c. 137), enacts "that no business shall be done at such general meeting until forty commissioners, at least, are present." As forty commissioners did not attend the meeting, no business was done. From the circumstance that forty-four commissioners voted for the gentleman who has been elected, the miscarriage of the meeting on Wednesday has been much talked of.

Railway Club.—Amidst the many projects under the head of "railways," we find one now in course of formation for the establishment of a club-house, where gentlemen of all ranks connected with railway projects may daily meet for the interchange of information. A mansion has been taken at the west end. —Globe.

Escheat to the Crown.—An inquiry of a novel kind was gone into last Saturday afternoon, at the Royal York Hotel, Brighton. A commission was opened by letters patent, under the great seal, constituting Horatio Waddington, George Maule, and Robert Upperton, esqrs. commissioners to ascertain whether one Maurice Alfred Barrow, deceased, who had been a solicitor at Brighton and East Grinstead, had been possessed of certain freehold property in Brighton which, in default of a devise, and for want of heirs, devolved to the Crown, as an escheat on Mr. Barrow's death. A jury was empanelled to assist the commissioners in their inquiry; and evidence was afterwards called to prove the necessary facts. From this evidence, it appeared that the deceased, by his will dated the 17th of March, 1831, devised the residue of his estate and effects to his wife. On the 22nd of June, 1841, being at that time in possession of a great number of very small houses at the top of North-street, part of which were freehold and part copyhold, he enfranchised the copyhold, for a consideration paid to the lord of the manor; and in the following October he died, without making a new will or re-publishing the old one. Consequently this property did not pass by will. In order to prove that the property was an escheat, it was next necessary to prove that the deceased died without heirs. His widow was called to prove that they had no children; and in order to shew that there could be no collateral heirs, documentary and other evidence was produced, shewing that the deceased was the illegitimate son of Maurice Barrow, formerly of Horsham, by a married woman named Thompson, with whom he had cohabited for several years up to the time of his decease. In the will of the old gentleman the deceased was described as "Maurice Alfred Barrow, my son, whom I have had by Mary Thompson," which Mary Thompson had afterwards some legacies left to her on condition that she did not cohabit with her husband or marry again. The parentage of the deceased being thus established, the commissioners explained to the jury that by the law of England a person of illegitimate birth had, in the eye of the law, no father, or mother, brothers, sisters, or other collateral relations; and the jury thereupon agreed to a verdict that the property in question had devolved to her Majesty as her escheat by virtue of the prerogative royal. The houses in question formerly formed a cluster of small filthy residences at the top of North-street, and they have been recently removed in order to form an approach to the railway. Portions of the site are about to be sold as building ground, and it was found necessary to resort to these proceedings in order to get a title to the property, it being customary for the party most interested in property thus situated to procure a declaration of the forfeiture to the Crown, in which case he ...... s it back as a grant from the sovereign. The proceedings in this case were instituted by the widow.

The late Mrs. Lawrence.—It is now ascertained that the vast landed estates of the late munificent Mrs. Lawrence, of Studley-park, are bequeathed as follows:—the Studley and Ripon property, including Fountains Abbey and Hackfall, to Earl de Grey; the Hutton, Sharrow, and Kirkby Malzeard estates, with the Moors, to the Earl of Ripon; the Leicestershire estates to Sir Cornwallis Ricketts, bart. and the manor and estate of Kirkby Fleetham to Mr. H. E. Waller, who, in case the deceased lady had died intestate, would, it is said, have been heir-at-law to the landed property. Legacies to large amounts have been left to several useful public charities and for religious purposes, as well as to many distant relatives and private friends.

CORRESPONDENCE.

SHORT CONVEYANCES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

Sir,—I regret that I cannot concur in your encomiums on the two Acts for shortening conveyances and leases; not on account of any anticipated reduction of fees, but for the following reasons:—

1. It is doubtful whether the Acts will make deeds much shorter than they might have been made without them. Take for instance Coventry's and Hayes's concise forms; I have lately had a draft prepared by counsel, for a special purpose, quite as short as the parliamentary form.

2. If not, it is a false principle of legislation to interfere to enable parties to do what they might do without legislation. It should compel, or abstain from interference in such cases.

3. It is especially faulty to alter the meaning of language; to attach a parliamentary sense to be interpreted only by the aid of the parliamentary glossary. In reading a conveyance, and especially a lease, few professional men without the Act at their elbow, and no common person with it, will understand the extent of the obligations. Leases, of all deeds, ought to be plain, and easy to be understood.

4. I think great difficulty will be found in adapting the forms of the Act to special cases not mentioned in it. Your correspondent "H. B." has adverted to one case, and others will quickly present themselves.

It is my intention to keep to my present forms, or to shorten them further if possible, and not to adopt the provisions of the Act; and to charge for the business done according to the trouble or the importance of the transaction, often reduced according to the ability of the parties.

If the Legislature had adopted the principle of the Wills Act, and enacted that a conveyance to a man should pass the estate to his real or personal representatives as the case might require, and that covenants by deed should bind the heirs and assigns of the covenanter, and be sued upon by the heirs and assigns of the covenanter, although not named, as well as the executors and administrators, it would have rendered unnecessary the frequent repetition of those words which perplex as well as excite the ridicule of non-professional persons. The covenants might be introduced thus—"The grantor covenants with the grantee;" "the lessor with the lessee;" "the mortgagor with the mortgagee," &c. If an enactment of this kind were made, I think the two Acts of last session would fall into desuetude, even if they do not without it. Indeed, they cannot be universally adopted, for they do not extend to mortgages, the most frequent transactions of all, and between parties the most requiring relief.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

J. R.

BENEFIT BUILDING SOCIETIES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

Sir,—My attention has lately been called to the subject of these societies, and a question has occurred to me which I should be obliged to the legal officer of one of them to answer.

Upon what authority do they receive money for the purpose of investment?

They all profess to be based exclusively on the 6 & 7 Wm. 4, c. 32, which enacts that it shall be lawful for any number of persons to form themselves into ...ties for raising by monthly or other subscription, shares not exceeding 150*l.* each, such subscriptions not to exceed 20*s.* per month, [to constitute(a)] a fund to enable each member to receive out of the funds the value of his share, to erect or purchase a house or other real or leasehold estate, to be secured by mortgage to the society, until the value of his share, with interest and fines, shall have been realized. Not a word is said about subscriptions for investment.

The fourth section declares, that the provisions of former Friendly Society Acts (10 Geo. 4 and 4 & 5 Wm. 4) shall, so far as applicable, extend to benefit building societies; but I apprehend that would not enlarge the objects of those societies, but merely supply the machinery for carrying them into operation.

I am aware that the 4 & 5 Wm. 4 permits, in terms, the formation of friendly societies for any purpose not unlawful; but the building societies do not profess to be founded even partly upon that Act; and if they did, I should doubt whether the ejusdem generis rule of construction would not restrict the purposes, so far as to exclude investment societies.

(a) These words appear to have been inadvertently omitted in the Act.

These societies having been certified by Mr. Tidd Pratt, convinces me that I am wrong; but I wish to be shewn the source of my error.

Yours, &c. J. R.

Re DENISON v. HAWKES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

SIR,—In the last number of the LAW TIMES, p. 487, appears a letter from Mr. James Sharp, jun. of Southampton, referring to my report of Denison v. Hawkes (see p. 457, ante), according to which report it may be remembered that Mr. Serjt. Stephen received the incipitur of the judgment on the roll and judgment-paper, and a writ of fi. fa. all under the seal of the Queen's Bench, as sufficient evidence of a judgment in proceeding on a summons under the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 127. Your correspondent Mr. Sharp then reminds the Profession that the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 127 (I presume he means the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 113), does not come into operation until November.

From Mr. Sharp's letter, it may possibly be presumed that the decision in Denison v. Hawkes was given under the erroneous impression that the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 113, the Official Documents Evidence Act, was already in operation; this, however, was not the case; that Act was mentioned by the plaintiff's attorney, Mr. Philpotts, who was then informed by Mr. Serjt. Stephen that the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 113, did not come into operation till the 1st November next. The grounds of the learned Serjeant's decision appeared to me not to be because the evidence tendered was, in his opinion, the strict legal evidence of a judgment, which it clearly was not, but because, in his opinion, the new Small Debts Act did not require the judgment to be formally proved according to the strict rules of evidence; that this Act should have a liberal construction, and that the evidence tendered, coupled with the writ of execution, which shewed the amount recovered, was sufficient to satisfy him that such a judgment had been recovered.

Yours truly, J. ANGUS HOMES.

Guildhall Chambers, Bristol,

SMALL DEBTS ACT.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

SIR,—My attention has been called to a letter, signed "A Solicitor," which appeared in the LAW TIMES of the 6th instant, requesting to be informed whether any of the readers of your excellent publication can explain the real meaning of the 9th section of the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 127. It would be great presumption on my part to answer in the affirmative; but I must beg leave, with the greatest deference, to differ with your correspondent as to the strict interpretation of the Act. It appears to me that, immediately on the enlargement of the jurisdiction of a court of requests, where commissioners act, they have the power of appointing a judge. The words of the Act are, "And in any court in which there shall be no judge qualified as aforesaid, the person or persons to whom the appointment of judge, or, if there be no judge, to whom the appointment of any clerk of the court belongs, or the majority of such persons who shall be present at a meeting called for the purpose, shall WITHIN three calendar months next after the making of any such order appoint a judge," and not "TILL three calendar months after," &c. And I have no doubt, if the commissioners memorialize her Majesty to extend the jurisdiction of any court, an order to that effect would be granted. It does not strike me, that where there are commissioners and no judge, the jurisdiction cannot be enlarged, but that a judge cannot be appointed until the jurisdiction of the court be extended.

There is a court of requests in this borough for the recovery of debts under 40s. in which commissioners act; and I understand these gentlemen have refused to appoint a judge until the jurisdiction of the court is extended to 20*l*.; but they intend to petition immediately, and on receiving the order of the Privy Council, will at once appoint a judge.

I am, Sir, yours, &c.

SMALL DEBTS BILL.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

SIR,—Till the local courts are duly organized, so as to meet the exigences of the present day, the working of the Small Debts Act will be sadly impeded, and those solicitors who do attempt to put its machinery in motion will be heartless enough as to the result. The inaptitude of these jurisdictions, however, will soon unfold, remedies will be applied, and then we may hope to see that exercise of vigour and judgment which will make the law to be respected.

Meanwhile there is enough to be done in endeavouring to comprehend the Act itself; no explorer into the language of hieroglyphics had a harder task. Sentences piled upon sentences, involution within involution, call for the utmost penetration and ingenuity to shape them into harmony—some parts more than the utmost; they cannot be comprehended; and all that one has left is to sigh for some ingenious fellow to read aright the signs of the draughtsmen of the Houses of Parliament. No wonder, then, that a "Solicitor" in your last asks if any of your readers can explain the real meaning of one of the "most extraordinary" clauses. I cannot. I have only to give "a Rowland for an Oliver," and refer him to the 12th section.

One or two ideas occur to me after looking through this Act. I see that the creditor may obtain a summons by "any" petition or note in writing according to the scheduled form. This looks like contradiction, first giving "any" or "every sort of" petition, and then confining it to a given form; however, it would not be safe to depart from the schedule. It seems certain that the summons must be served by a bailiff or messenger of the court, so that if you desire the presence of a debtor residing perhaps ninety-nine miles from the district court, and very likely next door to you, it is the "law" to invite one of these gentlemen down, in order to serve the debtor with the summons. Really one cannot help thinking that these messengers, when the Act was passing, put in "summut" for themselves. The order of imprisonment may be made on the non-attendance of debtor, and where he "shall not allege a sufficient excuse for not attending." Will poverty or inability to pay the expenses of journey be a sufficient excuse?

Sec. 4 gives the local courts the like powers as in sec. 1, of examining the parties during the progress of the suit, and upon occasion of giving judgment; the attendance of the parties on these occasions is, however, not compulsory. I suppose, then, that this section will only operate in the rare occurrence of both parties being voluntarily present.

Sec. 7 substitutes the principal keeper or gaoler for the Master Extraordinary in Chancery, as the person before whom affidavits are to be sworn. Their lordships, after a feeble resistance, allowed this disgraceful section to remain, thus permitting a turnkey of a gaol—for he may be the "principal gaoler"—to administer a solemn oath ("bribing the Deity," as Bentham would say) to a person who, lying in a cell, may be there for deeds little short of felony. Truly, if as the preamble of another Act of the session says (cap. 48), "it is highly desirable that oaths shall not be administered unnecessarily by public authority," it is at least as desirable that they should be administered when necessary with decency and due decorum.

There is no specific enactment as to wages; however, the 18th section, which empowers the i[illegible]g of summons to witnesses, thus enabling the master, &c. to be examined, may have the same effect.

The 22nd is one of the best of the 25 sections: the process of executing warrants and levying executions out of jurisdiction has long been required in civil cases; frequently defiance has been thrown at the officer, just out of the jurisdiction.

The provincial attorneys are watching the working of this Act by the Commissioners of the Bankruptcy Courts. I hope that, besides the ability and industry which procure us the reports of their sayings and doings in your journal, gentlemen in the country will shew their desire for the unanimous well-working of this Act, by forwarding statements of facts, &c. occurring in the local courts to which they have access. With these few words, I am, Sir, yours, &c. X.

THE LOST WILLS FROM DOCTORS' COMMONS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

SIR,—In this my fourth letter, allow me to premise, that although solicitors hold the desirable appointments of principals, registrars, proctors, &c. in the provincial civil courts and will business, and in such courts act as advocates, yet an attorney or solicitor is not to be found holding the slightest appointment in or about Doctors' Commons or its civil appurtenances; the usual cant words being, "They know too much for us." The real secret of the opposition of the Government, through the Right Hon. John Nicholl, the Judge Advocate-General, was to prevent barristers and solicitors from walking the halls of Doctors' Commons, although I am bound to say, there is more liberality on the part of the practising proctors, who would have no objection to admit solicitors to a share of their practice if the proctors were entitled to equal privileges.

The Government inquiry, amongst other evils, had laid before it the system of official taxation, and the blending of private and official business; but either the fact was too startling for the commissioners, or the abuse was considered by them as sure to fall beneath the alterations introduced; either way, they did not suggest, as they should have done, the annihilation of the objectionable system at once.

To explain what I mean by the previous paragraph, I will state that the system admits that A shall hold an official appointment, in which, if he acts according to the letter of civil etiquette, he is not allowed to practise as a proctor, and certainly not, upon every principle of justice, to tax, or look over, and settle the amount of the business bills that may be found in his own office. Now, Sir, the following artful plan is resorted to. A, the official before mentioned, takes into partnership other proctors not holding official appointments; a suit is generally conducted in the name of the junior proctor, who, when the business is at an end, makes out the bill and politely hands it over to the senior partner holding the official appointment, who, with a very liberal air, casts his eye over the sum total of the said bill of proctorial costs, which is then handed up to the judge of the court, who of course knows nothing of the matter; his signature is affixed, and then woe betide the debtor if it is not paid. There is no appeal, nor is there any thing said but simply, Pay, Sir! There is not a proctor who reads this but knows full well that it applies to the sayings and doings of several officials, as all the proctors who are not blessed with similar privileges know too well to their cost.

The excuse for this mode of practice, and which no doubt operated upon the minds of the Ecclesiastical Court Commissioners, mainly rested on the ground of the great respectability and honour of these well-paid officials; their lordships stating in the 46th page of their general report, that "the regular charges are, however, so well known and established, and the registrars of the several courts who are acting under the sanction of an oath of office, are so experienced and respectable, being generally selected out of the body of proctors on the ground of their high character and professional knowledge, that an exception to their report as to costs rarely occurs."

Under this report I have now selected one abuse, and when contrasted with the system of taxation, both in Chancery and Common Law, it is quite clear the Profession of the Law in all its departments should get rid of this as soon as possible.

You shall hear from me again next week regarding the depository of the lost wills, &c. &.

Yours obediently,

Doctors' Commons, J. T. SCOTT.

CORONERS' INQUESTS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

SIR,—Upon a canal in the county of A, and in the jurisdiction of the county coroner, a man meets with an accident and is killed. There being no place or house nearer than the borough of B, the body is conveyed thither. B is a corporate town, and the coroner thereof, finding the body in his jurisdiction, considers himself entitled to hold the inquest under 6 & 7 Victoria, c. 112, but which the county coroner insists he has no right to do.

The question in dispute, affecting as it does such of your readers as may be coroners, will, I doubt not, by them as haply by others not so particularly interested, be kindly and readily canvassed in your columns. I am, &c.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 13, 1845.

THE JUSTICES AND THE CORONERS OF DEVON.

A serious difference, it appears, has arisen between the justices and coroners of Devonshire, in consequence of the former disallowing the customary fees to these officers where the verdict was "Natural Death." The facts as they have reached us are as follows:—

At the Epiphany Sessions, 1845, the justices appointed a committee to consider the provisions of the Act 7 & 8 Vict. c. 92, to amend the law respecting the office of county coroner. The committee met, deliberated, and framed a report, in which they state that "whenever the jury return a verdict of 'Natural Death' or 'Died by the Visitation of God,' it is primâ facie a case in which the expenses ought not to be allowed." Furthermore, they recommend that the Court should order the coroners' accounts to be sent to the Committee of Accounts, with other bills; that the treasurer be ordered not to pay them unless signed by the chairman of the Appeal Court, and countersigned by the officer of the Court; and that the said chairman do not pass such accounts unless previously signed by the chairman of the Committee of Accounts. Lastly, that the Committee of Accounts be instructed not to pass the expense of any inquest, unless the finding be attached to it, and not to pass any inquest where the verdict is Natural Death or Visitation of God, unless reasons be shewn them that suspicion fairly arose that such death was not natural.

At the Easter Sessions this report was presented and adopted, and a copy sent to the coroners, the overseers of every parish, and all the magistrates of Devon. Up to the receipt of this circular, the coroners were equally uninformed of the steps which had been taken, and the resolution of the committee; no inquiry was made of them; nor were they offered the opportunity of a hearing.

At the Midsummer Sessions, the coroners were called in before the Committee of Accounts, and, instead of being merely required to produce vouchers and swear to their accounts, as before, the committee, acting on the recommendation above given, went into a rigorous examination of their inquests, and disallowed the fees where the verdict was Natural Death; and this on the authority of Lord Ellenborough's decision in Rex v. Justices of Kent (11 East, 229), and that of Lord Denman in Reg. v. Great Western Railway.

The result has virtually been to deprive the coroner of the discretion and authority vested in him by the laws; as the overseers and constables of each parish, since receipt of the justices' circular, decide on which is, and which is not, a proper subject for an inquest; and the coroner, apprehending his fee may be disallowed, does not always venture to interfere. This, there can be no doubt, is an insecure and undesirable state of things. If the power of calling an inquest or not be left in the hand of parish officers, who have local and family interests to bias them, the protection which the Legislature has thrown with such studied care about human life is really annulled.

The magistrates ought, therefore, to reconsider their determination, and avoid any step which shall remove from the coroner the responsibility of determining what are fit cases for the empanelling of a jury. The inquest is a part of the English constitution, proven by long usage to be highly conducive to the safety of the subject; and no one who is aware of the number of bodies found dead in foreign countries, and over which no inquiries are made, can doubt that the absence of such an institution, or the vesting of it in improper persons, is most injurious and dangerous.

At the same time, it is the coroner's duty to make proper inquiries, and to avoid putting the county to unnecessary expense. And this is a trust which we think must unavoidably be delegated to him; the discharge of it conscientiously must ever depend on his respectability. The 21st sec. of 7 & 8 Vict. cap. 92, expressly provides that where the coroner has made such inquiries, and thereby obviated the necessity for an inquest, the magistrates may, if they think fit, pay him the expenses he has incurred. By this it is clear that it is in the coroner, and neither in overseers nor constables, that the Legislature has vested the power of determining what is and what is not a fit case for inquest. Lord Denman, certainly, and we believe the other judges in the Queen's Bench, entertain very strong opinions in favour of the utility of coroner's inquests. The language used by the learned Chief Justice, in Reg. v. The Great Western Railway Company, does not, we opine, bear the construction put upon it by the magistrates of Devon; for one of the duties of a coroner unquestionably is to discover if the death was per infortunium; and the power of a jury to inflict a deodand shews that inquests ought to be held in many cases besides those of suspected murder or manslaughter. According to the tables and calculations of the Registrar-General, the number of deaths annually is nineteen in a thousand, and of these one person in twenty dies a sudden or violent death. The proportion of inquests in Devon, we learn, does not exceed this ratio; so that there appears no just grounds for supposing that the coroners have exceeded the strict limits of their duty.

At the time when this measure of the justices of Devon was under consideration, the authorities at Somerset-house were devising fresh means to provide for the protection of life and the detection of crime. From a circular on this subject, addressed to coroners by the Registrar-General, we extract the following passage:

It is believed that, although deaths by personal violence have diminished, poisoning, the violence called accidental, and the resulting dangers, have increased within the present century, which may be ascribed to the number of deadly poisons now so accessible in every chemist's shop, the introduction of the new force of steam, the redoubled activity of traffic, travelling, navigation, agriculture, manufactures, and mining operations. Science itself creates new instruments of death. But if these instruments be brought to light by your inquests, described accurately, and placed fully before the public, science will find no difficulty in discovering remedies, or rendering less harmful the new and striking, as well as the old and obscure, causes of violent death, which have made little noise, but have been in operation from time immemorial in every county of the kingdom.

It is to discover the dangers attendant on the occupations, pursuits, and various circumstances in which the population is placed, that I request your aid, in the hope that, if the causes of death are ascertained, additional security may be thrown around human life, and thus the great object of the coroner's inquest be promoted by the Registration Act.

We repeat our belief that it is highly dangerous to fetter the coroner in the manner which this step of the Devonshire magistrates has a tendency to do, and that we hope the latter will reconsider their determination.

LECTURES ON MEDICAL JURISPRUDENCE.

By Alfred S. Taylor.

Delivered at Guy's Hospital, 1844.

Lecture XIV.

The next metal which we have to consider is copper. The two principal salts of copper which have attracted attention are the sulphate and the subacetate. The sulphate of copper has been known to act as a powerful irritant in doses of half an ounce and upwards. It has a strong metallic taste, and no person can take it unknowingly. It induces vomiting of a most violent kind, and this sometimes effectually expels the poison from the stomach, and the person recovers. The vomited matters are remarkable in this point of view, that they are of a blue or green colour, and broken crystals of blue vitriol have been sometimes discovered in them, where the poison was taken in a loosely pulverulent state. There is pain in the abdomen, with diarrhœa; and in aggravated cases, spasms of the extremities. Paralysis, insensibility, and sometimes tetanus, have preceded death. The subacetate of copper (artificial verdigris) is a very irritant poison, producing symptoms similar to the sulphate. A case is recorded of a female, aged 24, who took half an ounce of this poison, and died, after violent symptoms of gastric irritation, in sixty hours. Sulphate of copper (blue vitriol) is supposed by the vulgar to have an abortive effect, and it is frequently employed for this purpose. It generally acts by exciting irritation in the system, under which the uterus may occasionally expel its contents. With regard to the post mortem appearances, where this poison has been taken, the mucous membrane of the stomach and intestines has been found more or less inflamed, and the lining membrane of the alimentary canal is often of a greenish colour. In a case of poisoning by carbonate of copper (natural verdigris), some time ago, the mucous membrane was of a green colour. As to the treatment in a case of poisoning by copper, all we have to do is to excite vomiting by warm water, or milk and water. Antidotes cannot be much relied upon. Sugar was formerly employed, but it has been found that the stomach has not a temperature high enough for it to be of any effect as a chemical antidote; it has no more effect a counter-poison than charcoal. Iron filings were also recommended, on the principle that iron separates the copper from the secretions, and precipitates it in a metallic state. There is no particular harm in administering them, except that when the iron filings are once coated with copper, their action is suspended, and therefore an enormous quantity must be given. Albumen is a better antidote, provided it be given in a large quantity, but in small quantities it has no effect at all. However, we should chiefly rely on the means to promote vomiting.

The salts of copper are generally known by their blue or green colour. The salts of nickel are also green, but this colour is not presented by the salts of any other metal. The soluble salts of copper are three; the sulphate, the nitrate, and the per-muriate; the sulphate and nitrate are blue, and the per-muriate is green. The insoluble salts are the subacetate, the carbonate, the arsenite, and the subchloride. The tests for copper are three in number; the first, ammonia, in small quantity, gives, in a solution of copper, a bluish white precipitate, which is dissolved, and forms a beautiful violet-blue solution when the ammonia is added in larger quantity. Secondly, ferrocyannate of potash, which gives a sort of coppery-red precipitate; thirdly, sulphuretted hydrogen, or hydrosulphuret of ammonia, either of which gives a brownish-black precipitate. These last, taken together, are free from objection. No other metal gives a precipitate like copper with ferrocyannate of potash; but there is one that gives a blue colour with ammonia, and that is nickel. There is, however, a difference in the tint, the blue colour of the nickel being paler; but nevertheless a person might be easily mistaken. How do we distinguish one from the other? A very simple method is to take the nitrate or other suspected solution of nickel, and dilute it with water, and then add ferrocyannate of potash, which gives a sort of apple-green precipitate. The reduction of copper to the metallic state may be produced by chemical affinity or by galvanism. If you introduce an iron spatula into a solution of salt of copper, slightly acidulated, a red layer of metallic copper is instantly deposited on the surface of the iron. There will appear to be no change effected on the iron while it remains in the liquid, but the moment it is taken out, the copper-red colour of copper is apparent. The reduction of copper by galvanism is very simple; you have only to place some of the solution of copper in a platina capsule, and then add a piece of zinc, and an abundant deposit of copper takes place. The salts of copper may be known by their different colours. The sulphate may be known from the nitrate by the difference of colour; it is of a rich blue colour, and is precipitated by nitrate of barytes, while the nitrate is red. The ammonia sulphate is of a rich violet-blue tint, and when a solution of arsenious acid is added, it gives a precipitate of Scheele's green. The nitrate is of a deep blue colour, and very deliquescent, and, with carbonate of potash, nitrate of potash is formed. The chloride, or per-muriate, is of an emerald-green colour, and is precipitated by nitrate of silver. It is very soluble in water, forming a deep green solution if concentrated; but becoming blue when diluted. This diluted solution has the remarkable property of becoming green when heated to 212°, and again becoming blue on cooling, at 60°. There is no explanation of this circumstance as far as I know. The test for the acid of this salt of copper is nitrate of silver, with which it yields an abundant white precipitate. All the insoluble salts of copper, the subchloride, the subacetate, the carbonate, and the arsenite, are used in the arts, and are also employed to give colour to confectionary in a most improper way, since, when thus used, they give rise to many serious accidents. The identification of these insoluble salts is very simple; all we have to do is to put a little ammonia into a saucer, and drop into it a portion of one of the salts, say the carbonate, and in an instant an intense violet-blue colour is brought out. The same result takes place with all the salts. When these insoluble salts are rubbed on an iron spatula with diluted sulphuric acid, metallic copper is immediately deposited. The subchloride of copper frequently gives rise to accidents in cookery, occasioned by boiling food in vessels of copper. The carbonate, when heated on a platina foil evolves carbonic acid, and black oxide of copper is left. The arsenite, when gently heated in a reduction-tube, forms a deposit of arsenious acid, and when heated with charcoal powder, it forms a ring of metallic arsenic. The subacetate possesses the property, when heated in tubes, of depositing copper in the metallic state, and of giving out acetic acid vapour which reddens litmus-paper.

Now it will be necessary here to consider the means of analysing copper in the contents of the stomach, or in organic liquids. A person may have the poison administered in articles of food, and therefore it becomes important to know what are the means of detecting it when it has been so administered. The oxide of copper is liable to be precipitated by certain organic principles, as albumen, fibrin, and mucous membrane; but some of these organic compounds are either dissolved by acids or an excess of the salt. We may have the copper dissolved and not precipitated, and whenever that is the case, we know it by the fact that the liquid is always of a green colour. In order to find out whether there is much or little copper present, a very good test is oxalic acid, which forms a bluish-white precipitate in a salt of copper—the oxalate of copper. Oxalic acid is a good test when the quantity of copper is small, but when it is diluted, it does not throw it down. Oxalic acid also precipitates other bodies, and therefore it is not a test to be solely relied upon in this instance. Another very good trial test is to put a quantity of the suspected solution on a steel plate, when a deposit of metallic copper instantly takes place. The copper may be separated from the liquid by passing into it a current of sulphuretted hydrogen gas, when a precipitate of sulphuret of copper comes down in the form of a black powder. How do we know this to be sulphuret of copper? We may ascertain this by washing the powder and drying it, and then boiling it in equal parts of nitric acid and water; decomposition takes place, and both nitrate and sulphate of copper are formed and dissolved, a fact which is indicated by the liquid becoming blue, and been rendered of a rich violet-blue colour by the addition of ammonia. There is no reliance to be placed on the action of ferrocyannate of potash in such cases, until the acid solution has been neutralized.

It is a common practice for people to colour their preserved gooseberries and other green fruit by adding to them a quantity of the sulphate or the acetate of copper, and the presence of either may easily be tested by introducing into it a needle, which in a very short time will be coated with metallic copper. Copper may also be detected in such substances by galvanism, by the aid of a platina capsule and a piece of zinc. A short time since some preserved gooseberries were sent to me for examination, as it was suspected from circumstances that they were contaminated with copper. The liquid in which they were preserved was of a pale yellow colour, and had an acid reaction. The tests I have before described were employed, and the result was, that the liquid was proved to be strongly impregnated with sulphate of copper. Copper is said to be a natural constituent in the animal organs, and to enter into the composition of the mucous membrane of the stomach; but this is very doubtful, and no trace of it has been discovered in the blood. You may be consulted on a point of this kind: How far is it safe to use copper vessels for culinary purposes? It is to be observed that these vessels are liable to become impregnated with the poison, and if common salt be present, the chloride of copper is readily formed. But there is this important fact to be considered; any liquid boiled in copper vessels is only liable to be poisoned if it is allowed to cool in the vessels; otherwise no injury is created. Copper vessels are sometimes lined with tin, but it is far better to keep them untinned, for this reason: unless they be well tinned, and kept in a proper condition, if a portion of the surface of the copper becomes exposed, the tin and the copper together will exert a galvanic action, and any acid liquid will displace the salt of copper formed. If soups be boiled in copper vessels, it is necessary, in order to prevent any accident, to pour the soup out while hot, and allow it to cool in another vessel. Such are the principal facts connected with poisoning by copper, and in the next lecture we shall pass on to consider poisoning by tin and some other metals.

A Popular and Practical Introduction to Law Studies, and to every Department of the Legal Profession: with an account of the state of the Law in Ireland and Scotland, and occasional Illustrations from American Law. By Samuel Warren, Esq., of the Inner Temple, Barrister-at-Law. Second Edition. London: Maxwell and Co. 1845.

Although in name a second edition of a book published by Mr. Warren some ten years since, so numerous are the alterations, so great the additions, that it is virtually a new work. Its bulk has swollen to considerably more than double its original size; fresh topics have been introduced, and altogether, the interest and utility of the treatise have been much increased. The author informs us in his preface that "he has had ten years of additional experience, both as a pleader and at the bar," with "more extensive opportunities than he had previously enjoyed of becoming practically acquainted with the profession in all its departments."

With the original design of an introduction to law studies has been incorporated another one, intended to be a distinct work; an elementary and popular outline of the leading doctrines and practice of each of the three great departments of the law. Some of these chapters "have cost him much labour." Moreover he tells us, that with reference to the chapters devoted to the general education of persons designed for the legal profession, "the author has bestowed great pains upon them." Once again, "the author has taken the trouble of collecting together much practical information concerning all branches of the profession." Lastly, we are told that "this work has cost its author the severe and unremitting labour, during every moment which he could spare from business, of the last twelve months.

When we look at the size of the volume, and observe that the pages have swollen from about four hundred to upwards of a thousand, we must confess to considerable perplexity, how any time spared from business could suffice for the product of a labour so enormous, as the preface, by its reiteration of the fact, would seem to intimate: for a law book is not to be written with the onward flowing pen that produced Ten Thousand a Year, and the Diary of a late Physician. But this is a matter of small moment to the reader, who cares nothing, how or when, or why, a book was written, whether in the intervals of business, or as a task of professed authorship, provided only that it please his taste or supply his needs. If Mr. Warren can turn from romance to law, amusing at one moment, and instructing the next, we can recognize no reason why he should not do so; nor why excellence in the one walk should be held to imply inferiority in the other.

The subjects treated of in this volume are sufficiently important to justify the attention they have received. It opens with a preliminary view of the present state of the Bar, its students and practitioners. In this Mr. Warren notices the enormous crowding into that branch of the Profession which has lately taken place, and which must be attended with widely-spread misery to hundreds, who cannot possibly live by it, and who have thus precluded themselves from other callings, where fortune is more lavish of her favours. The number of Barristers in 1832 was 1130; in 1843 it was 2484. Such an increase is unprecedented in any employment; and this is accompanied by a decrease of business to be divided among them. It would be well if men would calmly consider this, before they stake their fortunes upon so hazardous a die, unless well assured that they have the means of living, in case of probable failure in the peculiar abilities that will ensure success. In this chapter Mr. Warren eloquently vindicates the study of the law from the absurd notion that it narrows the mind.

Trust us, however, if even this "mere" lawyer moves all his days like a horse in a mill, his round is a pretty extensive one! Consider, for a moment, what he must know, and what he has to do. If supposed to be in what is called "good practice at the Bar," he must be, to a very considerable extent, acquainted with the leading details of the arts and sciences, of trade, commerce, and manufactures; of the sister professions; even of the amusements and accomplishments of society—for in all of these, questions are incessantly arising which require the decision of a court of justice, for which purpose their most secret details must be laid bare before the eyes of counsel, who is expected to come into court quite au fait at them! A knowledge of constitutional history, also, and the many important topics subsidiary to it, can hardly be dispensed with.—The barrister, moreover, who aspires after eminence should possess a keen insight into character, and strong powers of eliciting truth, detecting falsehood, and unravelling intricate tissues of sophistry. His mind should be in such a state of health and discipline as to render him capable of deep abstraction, of long and patient application, and, in short, give him effectual control over his well-tempered faculties, so that he may concentrate them upon any subject he chooses, passing rapidly from one to another of the most opposite character. Take a sample of the every-day employment of the higher class of counsel. His "opinion" is sought upon a "case," which discloses numerous commercial or other relations, deranged by the sudden death, marriage, bankruptcy, or separation of one of the parties concerned. Mark the apparently inextricable confusion into which extensive interests, rights, and liabilities are precipitated—cross accounts of many years to be mastered—probably an immense fortune at stake. Is it nothing, now, to answer such a case as this, with rapidity and skill—to adjust these conflicting claims with a precision which often satisfies the most clamorous contendants, preventing, perhaps, a long course of ruinous litigation? See the comprehensive grasp of thought—the accurate analysis—the rapid generalisation—the perfect mastery over details—the extensive research—the decision—exhibited on such occasions by the well-trained legal intellect! This is no highly-wrought picture: many of its features will be found displayed, more or less, in the daily business of a well-employed chamber or court practitioner. What, again, is to be said of the large emoluments to be derived, by such a man as we have been describing, from his honourable and responsible toils—the station he occupies, the influence he exerts, in society—the rank he attains both in the senate and on the Bench?

The second chapter treats of the choice of the Legal Profession. It is addressed to those who are hesitating whether they shall come to the Bar; and it abounds in wholesome truths. He states the prizes, but describes also the difficulties that lie in the way of ambition. Greatest of these is the vast increase of numbers, which distributes the favour-business among so many that it is of little worth to each one, while it diminishes the chances of decided success for those who are qualified. The consequences of a mistake in the choice of this profession are fearful:—

The keen competition—the, too frequently, bitter and unfriendly rivalry to be encountered—the publicity of the struggle,—the obstacles impeding the acquisition of the necessary knowledge,—the harassing nature of business to the successful practitioner, and of responsibility, with scarce any intermission or alleviation: these are a few of the considerations which imperiously call for the most searching self-examination, before such a "warfare is undertaken." For of what avail is the most perfect intellectual aptitude, if united to physical incompetency, of which many mournful instances have fallen under the author's personal notice! What, on the other hand, are a melodious voice, a commanding appearance, an iron constitution—

——robur et æs triplex,

if not conjoined with intellectual adequacy? Or shining talents, if not of the kind practically suitable for our profession?

What are the requisites, wanting any one of which no prudent man should go to the Bar? Physical strength to endure hard work; hot court, little sleep, irregular meals, the abandonment of social pleasures. The mind must be peculiarly constituted.

Have you a capacity and disposition for persevering application? Are you conscious of a logical and argumentative turn of mind? Are your perceptions quick and clear? Is your memory capacious and retentive? Your judgment sound? Are you—aspiring after eminence—capable of extensive or deep research? Not only of acquiring learning, but using it? Do you believe that you are, or can become, equal to the "occasion SUDDEN,—the practice dangerous"—spoken of by Lord Coke? Have you, or do you think that you can acquire, the collectedness, presence of mind, self-reliance, and self-control, which this will require? That ductility, elasticity, activity: that expansive and contractile power of mind which can adapt itself to everything, and pass in a moment from one engagement to another, of the most different character—from labyrinth to labyrinth—with unwearied energy, with a mind unconfused? Are you capable of fixed attention? Are you gifted with natural powers of persuading and convincing, equally, superior and inferior minds—cultivated and uncultivated? Of publicly detecting and confounding artful falsehood and imposture in the witness-box?

Lastly, he must have pecuniary resources to fall back upon, or his lot will be miserable indeed. His expenses are certain and great: his gains dubious, and, even with the most fortunate, for years trifling. He has to maintain the position of a gentleman, and the independence essential to the preservation of that character. Without a sufficient income fr other sources, he must submit to terrible privations, or fall under the strong temptations by which he will be surrounded. In reply to many applications, Mr. WARREN thus states the expenses of going to the Bar, and the income necessary to keep him there; and wanting which, no prudent man will venture upon a course so likely to involve him in a future of poverty and wretchedness.

To begin with the beginning First, an outlay of about 35*l.* is requisite to pay the fees, stamps, &c. attending the admission into any of the four Inns of Court. Secondly, 100*l.* must be deposited with the treasurer, by way of security (unless the applicant shall produce a certificate of his having kept two years' Terms in any of the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, or Dublin, or—at Lincoln's Inn—of his being a member of the Faculty of Advocates in Scotland), to be returned on his either quitting the profession or being called to the Bar (in the latter instance, however, only nominally returned, for it is nearly all swallowed up in the expenses of being called to the Bar), or refunded to his personal representative, in the event of his death. Thirdly, except in very rare cases of unusual intellectual power, and aptitude for the acquisition of legal learning, it is impossible for a student to do justice to himself without at least two years' pupilage, which will be 210*l.* There may be instances of persons successfully dispensing with one of these years, but the author knows of only one. If it can possibly be done, three years should be devoted to pupilage. Fourthly, the annual charge for purchasing law books during the period of pupilage is about 6*l.* or 8*l.* while the cost of "keeping commons" amounts to about 5*l.* or 7*l.* a year, if he choose to dine barely a sufficient number of times to keep the Te Fifthly, there are the expenses of board, lodging, clothes, &c. &c. which, with the most severe economy, cannot, it is conceived, be reduced under 150*l.* a year, in the case of an unmarried man, during the period of pupilage or chamber practice. Sixthly, on commencing practice, at the very least, 80*l.* or 100*l.* will be requisite to purchase a library wi (the sum usually laid out is about 200*l.*), and from 15*l.* to 20*l.* a year will be requisite for ntinuing the Reports &c. Seventhly, being called to the Bar, a wig and gown cost usually 8*l.* 8*s.* Eighthly, the expense of going to sessions and circuit (all of which is saved by a student going to the Equity Bar) cannot possibly be less than 90*l.* or 100*l.* a year. Cæteris paribus, it may be said generally, that an immediate command of at least 300*l.* and a continuing income of 250*l.* a year, constitute a sine quâ non to a successful and comfortable entrance into the legal profession. Let it not be lost sight of, that a man, after six, eight, ten, or more years' experience at the Bar, may fail, at a period of his life when he may be unable to turn advantageously to another calling; and what if he have then no reserve fund to fall back upon!

The third chapter is devoted to students, their characters, objects, pretensions, and prospects. He divides the students into three classes; the nominal or amateur st lent, the gentleman student seeking knowledge to help him as a legislator or magistrate and not as a practitioner, and the veritable student, looking for a livelihood and honour.

The next chapter is entitled, "On the Formation of a Legal Character," and treats of the first portion of this subject, the general conduct of the student; and this is followed by a statement of the general knowledge and mental discipline required. These chapters cont much good practical advice, and should be read attentively by all who are entering upon the profession.

The author then treats of the practical study of the [illegible] al history of England, and the different departments of the legal profession, civil, criminal, and ecclesiastical. The 11th chapter shews how the practical study of the common law should be commenced and prosecuted; this is followed by a sketch of the history and character of special pleading. Then there is an outline of a course of law reading, principally designed for the common law student; and, as this is a subject upon which we receive continual applications for advice, we will briefly state the books and their order suggested by Mr. WARREN.

He insists that the student should first address himself to pleading; using the admirable treatise on Pleading of Mr. Serjeant STEPHEN, and this to be followed by Chitty's Archbold's Practice.

Having thus obtained a general knowledge of pleading and practice, he should address himself to evidence, and for this purpose should read STARKIE's masterly treatise. The machinery of the law being in this manner learned, the student may enter upon the general body of the law, consisting of civil rights and liabilities, in respect of persons and property: the two grand divisions being mercantile law and real property law. To master mercantile law he should read

Chitty on Contracts not under seal,
The Treatises of Mr. Justice Story,
Byles on Bills of Exchange,
Collyer on Partnership,
Smith's Mercantile Law,
Selwyn's Nisi Prius,
Abbot on Shipping,
Park on Insurance.

For the study of Real Property Law, he recommends,

Wright's Tenures,
Williams's Principles of the Law of Real Property,
The 2nd vol. of Blackstone's Commentaries,
Sanders on Uses and Trusts,
Shepherd's Touchstone,
Jarman on Wills,
Breston on Estates and Abstracts of Title,
Sugden on Powers,
Sugden on Vendors and Purchasers,
Pruell on Mortgages,
Fearne on Contingent Remainders,
Cruse's Digest,
Coke upon Lyttelton.

For general heads of the Law, should be studied with attention—

Woodfall's Landlord and Tenant,
Williams on Executors and Administrators,
Burges's Colonial and Foreign Law,
Saunders's Reports,
Smith's Leading Cases,
Stephens's Blackstone,
Chitty's General Practice of the Law.

The Methods and Objects of Law Reading are considered in the following chapter. For these we refer the reader to the volume itself, and we pass on to the next, which consists of "practical suggestions, designed to facilitate both the study and practice of the law." We select a passage from the section entitled "How to acquire the art of effectively stating viva voce facts and arguments.

Acquire this habit, good student, if you have it not—anxiously cultivate it if you have—or save the stamps and other expenses of a call to the Bar—or make a present of your wig and gown, if you have precipitately purchased them, to some one who may make a better use of them. How lamentable is it to see a man of talent and learning, unable to acquit himself, even creditably, in this respect—possibly on the most trivial occasions rising embarrassed—confused—stuttering and stammering uttering "vain and idle repetitions," with the agonising accompaniments of "a—a—a," and sitting down, overwhelmed with vexation and disappointment! However clear may be a man's conceptions, however consecutive his thoughts, however thorough and extensive his knowledge, he may yet exhibit this sorry spectacle, unless he be either naturally gifted with powers of eloquence, or have struggled early and successfully to supply his natural deficiencies. "There is an important distinction," remarks Dugald Stewart, "between the intellectual habits of men of speculation, and of action. The latter, who are under a necessity of thinking and deciding on the spur of the occasion, are led to cultivate, as much as possible, a quickness in their mental operations; and sometimes acquire it in so great a degree, that their judgments seem almost intuitive." Bearing in mind, then, this observation, let it be the student's first step towards the attainment of so desirable an object as that now under consideration, to become a practical man—to accustom himself to the sudden marshalling of his thoughts for action. Let him often think aloud—often state suddenly the substance of what has been engaging his attention, and under the impression that he is doing it publicly. The more vividly he can imagine himself in such circumstances—can people his room with imaginary auditors—the better, the more vigorous will be his efforts to acquit himself well. Let him imagine his judge severe, his audience learned and critical; this will stimulate him to a rigid adherence to his subject. He will aim at as simple a style of expression—as close and succinct a statement, as possible, of facts and reasonings; turning not for a moment to the right hand or the left, nor encumbering himself with needless details. Let him resolutely reject all surplusage of thought or expression—keeping his object constantly in view, and going direct to it. Nothing but this will protect him hereafter from the painful and disheartening mischance of suddenly losing, when engaged in public, the connection of his thoughts—or will, at all events, put him in the way of quickly recovering it. The student must learn not only to think, but to express himself, consecutively. He must not for a moment forget the object with which he set out, or cause his hearers to forget it, by wandering into irrelevant matter, or undue amplification. Let him, therefore, in such solitary exercitations as those now recommended, throw himself entirely into his case—be as much in earnest as though he were actually engaged in public debate—suffering no incident—no sudden suggestion—no momentary interruption, to put him off his guard. Having thus, as it were, broken the ice, let him next practise similarly before some judicious friend, who will try him with a few interruptions—press him with questions—check his redundancies, and recal him from digressions. This will be found an invaluable expedient. His next step may be to enter one of the legal debating societies.

Mr. WARREN objects to the system of laborious transcription and common-placing, so much in vogue with students, and we think rightly, for too often it is a mere labour of the pen, not of the mind.

It is by no means the author's wish, however, to express an unqualified disapprobation of this system; it is against the abuse of it that he would guard his younger readers; against the fatal facility with which they may fall into habits destructive, not to the memory only, but all the other powers of the mind. If a common-place book is to be kept let it be kept judiciously, and be appropriated to the reception of those passages only, met with in the course of reading, which are either rare, or very striking in point of argument or expression. Does the student happen to stumble upon a few sentences which, in an instant, clear up difficulties that have haunted him for months—it may be years—they are worthy of an entry in his common-place book—or at least of a reference; and, if they be altogether passed by, he may not be able to meet with them again, however great may be his emergency. How many choice passages in the judgments of a Hardwicke, a Mansfield, a Kenyon, an Ellenborough, an Eldon, or a Tenterden, and other distinguished judges, have charmed him for a moment, and then been lost, for want of being entered, or referred to, in his common-place book! The late Sir Samuel Romilly has left on record his testimony in favour of the prudent mode of common-placing here recommended. "As I read, I formed a common-place book, which has been of great use to me even to the present day. It is, indeed, the only way in which law reports can be read with much advantage."

The chapter on Attorneys and Solicitors contains much useful suggestion. The hints to a young articled clerk as to his course of reading will be useful.

At present, he would recommend that a youth, on first entering an office, should content himself, for a month or two, with getting an insight into the routine of business. Then Smith's Elementary View of the Proceedings in an Action at Law may be put into his hands, followed by Stephen on Pleading, of which only the first part is to be read. Then select portions of Mr. Maugham's General Principles of the Law of England, of Mr. Williams' Principles of the Law of Real Property, and of Mr. Smith's Mercantile Law, and of Selwyn's Nisi Prius, may be read with great advantage by an industrious pupil, under his master's direction. The author also would venture to recommend for perusal the chapters in this work devoted to the subjects of Equity, Common Law, Conveyancing, and Criminal Law, in which will be found a plain account of the existing mode of administering these great branches of the law. But his main object should be to master the general run of business in the office—the practical mode of enforcing or resisting rights, in the different courts—the ordinary conveyances and pleadings which are continually passing under his eye—endeavouring, at the same time, to refer for the full explanation of them to the works above-mentioned. He should also make a point of studying the opinions and drafts of pleaders, conveyancers, and barristers; and, whenever he has an opportunity, should make a copy of them, together with a short abstract of the facts to which they relate. He will soon find himself reaping great benefit from such a practice.

And equally sensible is the advice to young attorneys, for the practical conduct of their business.

When you have received instructions to commence an action, beware lest, in your praiseworthy desire to save expense to your client, you plunge him into much greater, and peril the success of his cause, by acting upon your own judgment, in choosing the form of action, and framing the Declaration and Particulars. Unless the case be really of the plainest kind, do not undertake the responsibility of preparing the pleadings—nor think seven and sixpence or half a guinea ill-spent, in having them prepared by a pleader. When, however, you think it right to draw your declaration and particulars of demand, pay special attention to the framing of the latter, especially with reference to what credits you will give to the defendant. It is often prudent to give him none at all—but leave him to exonerate himself from the debit, as best he may. Though such a course may occasion you the costs of a plea of payment, it may secure you several advantages: e. g. the defendant may be forced to call some one to prove it, from whom you may obtain valuable evidence, and secure your counsel the reply. Be very careful how you rely in your particulars, upon a "balance" of accounts, and beware of pleas of payment, set-off, or of payment of money into court, in such a case. If you be not on your guard, you may be quietly jockied—and not find out your fatal error till consultation—or even till the trial; or, at all events, you may have to amend your particulars, pay the costs of the defendant's pleas, and be too late to try your cause at the sittings or assizes at which you had intended to try it. (Refer to Eastwick v. Harman, 6 Mee. & W. 13; Price v. Rees, 11 Mee. & W. 576; Kenningham v. Alison, 2 D. N. S. 651; and Lamb v. Meckelthwaite, 9 Dow. 531. If you resolve to instruct a pleader, do so before issuing out your writ; and let your instructions to him, in the first instance, be as full and accurate as if you were preparing rather your brief than instructions for drawing the declaration. Get out all the facts from your client in the first instance, and not piecemeal—and only in consequence of the expensive suggestions of your opponent!—Whenever the defendant is an executor or administrator, if he be your client, lose not a moment in laying instructions before your pleader, in order that you may not be compelled to ask for time, which you cannot obtain (if your opponent understand his business), except on condition that you will not in the mean time, confess a judgment to other creditors, as you might otherwise have done; and if you be concerned for a plaintiff, when the defendant is an executor or administrator, and he be obliged to ask for time to plead, be sure that you impose on him the terms of not confessing any judgment in the mean time; this a judge will do, on your application. (Anon. 8 Mod. 308; Hugh v. Pellet, Barnes, 330; 1 Arch. Pr. 162 (7th edition). It is by no means clear that an attorney, omitting to take such a precaution, would not be held guilty of actionable negligence.

Lose not a moment, especially in cases of difficulty and importance, in laying a declaration or other pleading before your pleader or counsel, within the time limited, in order, that, if deemed advisable (and it frequently is very desirable), you may demur specially. This you would be prevented from doing, if forced to obtain time for pleading, which would be granted only on the terms of your pleading issuably. Most important advantages are constantly sacrificed by inattention to this suggestion. Counsel have the mortification of seeing, not till after time has been obtained, a manifest technical flaw in a declaration, which would have secured him the costs of a demurrer, on which he might have also tried the substantial sufficiency of the declaration, where the point was too doubtful to have warranted incurring the risk, or expense, of demurring generally. Always deliver your briefs, if you can possibly do so, in sufficient time for counsel really to master them. Do not push off everything to the last moment—the consequence of doing so are often fatal to your case. Fix a consultation, too, at a reasonable period before the cause comes on, in order that you may have time to avail youself of counsel's suggestions—often of vital importance—to obtain additional evidence, or make some application to a judge for leave to amend, or otherwise. Where you have taken a preliminary opinion upon the merits of your case, generally, especially from experienced pleaders or counsel, insert a copy of it in your brief, with some such heading as—"The following is Mr. ——'s opinion, on the strength of which this action was brought (or defended)." If your leader be in large practice, and severely pressed for time, a glance at this opinion will often enable him to seize, in a moment, the true points of the case, which otherwise be could not have done.

In drawing up your "proofs," take pains to insert, under the name of each witness, full details of his expected evidence, with distinct reference to the issues to which such evidence is applicable. Some are as prolix in doing so, as others sparing. Bear in mind that your junior, who may be young and comparatively inexperienced, will probably have to examine the first witness. Be therefore careful to let that proof, in such a case, be as full and distinct as you know how to make it.

See witnesses yourself; take their evidence deliberately, and read it over to them distinctly, so that counsel may be able, in conducting the case, to rely upon being able to establish their statement to the jury.

We now close this volume, from which we have gathered much instruction, and no small degree of pleasure, and with our respect for the author greatly enhanced by its perusal. It is sensible and practical as well as eloquent and elegant; and the number and beauty of the quotations with which it is studded, give to it an additional value and, combined with its other recommendations, make it by far the best work of its kind that has yet been offered to the profession.

JOURNAL OF PROPERTY.

RAILWAY SPECULATIONS.

(From the Spectator.)

On a moderate estimate, the railways already in existence and to be executed may be taken to cost	£150,000,000
The gross profit on that capital, at 8 per cent. would be	12,000,000
From which a deduction of 35 per cent. for expenses (the lowest expenditure of any large company) would amount to	4,200,000
Leaving the net profit of . . .	7,800,000

or not quite 5¼ per cent. upon the capital.

In other words, to afford the shareholders in all our completed and projected railways a return of rather less than 5¼ per cent. upon their outlay, the public must annually expend 12,000,000*l.* in railway travelling alone.

The word "million" comes glibly from the tongue, but conveys no tangible image to the mind. An effort is required to realize to the imagination the magnitude of the sum which must be annually spent on railway travelling to yield our speculators a moderate profit on their capital. Let any one attempt distinctly and articulately to count aloud from one to a million; he will find it hard work to enunciate on the average one thousand numbers in the hour, and would consequently require 100 days for 10 hours a day to count the million. The mechanical operation of telling over a million of sovereigns piece by piece would occupy a full month, at the rate of 3,600 an hour for 10 hours a day. The joint earnings of 1,830 agricultural labourers with their 7s. a week for 30 years each, not a working-day left out, would be less than a million of pounds sterling. The joint earnings of 640 mechanics at 20s. a week, toiling each as unremittingly during the same period, would not amount to a million of pounds sterling. The pay of 90 British general officers at 1*l.* a day would not in 30 years amount to a million of pounds sterling. So much of toil and danger, and exposure to the elements—so much of patient, persevering, and more or less skilful industry—so much of valour, and accomplishment, and high spirit, as represented by money—may be bought for a million of pounds sterling.

And our railway projectors and speculators calculate upon drawing twelve of these millions annually from the pockets of the public. In other words, they expect that 12,000,000 of people—half the population of the three kingdoms, men, women, and children (at 1½d. per mile)—will each travel 160 miles by railway every year, and pay them 20s. a head. Or they expect that 1,000,000 people will travel 1,920 miles each in the course of the year, and pay them 12*l.* a head. Or they expect that 120,000 people will each travel 16,000 miles by railway every year, and pay them 100*l.* per head. Be it remembered, too, that railway travelling constitutes but a fraction of the whole annual travelling of the nation. Our railways, existent and in projection, embrace not one-half of the surface and population of Great Britain; and even in the railway districts there is active competition from steam-boats, omnibuses, cabs, vans, spring-carts, &c. The steam-boats of the Thames and the Clyde carry more passengers than the Greenwich Blackwall, and Glasgow and Greenock Railways. In the great towns, not only the wealthier classes as a badge of station and for amenity, but tradesmen for professional purposes, keep vehicles, which, when travelling on business or for pleasure they from sheer economy generally employ in preference to other modes of conveyance. In the rural districts, landowners and farmers do the same. Again, the price of a railway ticket is only part of the outlay of the railway traveller on conveyances. In most cases it implies the additional expense of short stage, cab, or omnibus, to convey him to and from the railway, or from one railway to another.

Our sanguine projectors and speculators pay little heed to these considerations; though the brokers, who are agents in the transfer of shares, often ask each other in wonderment, where all the travellers are to come from? Put the question to any dabbler in railway stock, and he replies with an "Oh, with the increase of locomotive facilities, travelling will increase indefinitely." It may be so; hitherto the theory has held good; yet there must be some natural limit to the activity of the principle. Men do not travel for travelling's sake, but on business or for pleasure—to earn money, or to spend it; and what possible facility will set men in motion where these motives are wanting? The enormous amount of money invested in railways would seem to imply that some classes of Englishmen are expected to live on railways, as some classes of Chinese live on their canals. To render these undertakings remunerative, a numerous portion of society would need, like the fabled birds of paradise, to keep always on the wing—to spend their lives darting from town to town with the velocity of swallows in a summer evening. The boldness and extent of these aggregate undertakings convey a magnificent idea of the resources and enterprise of Britain; but their very magnitude lies like a load on the imagination, while the incessant restlessness and swift movements they presuppose in such a numerous class of the community make the head giddy only to think of.

WESTMINSTER BRIDGE.—From 1810 to 1838 this bridge cost in repairs 83,097*l.* 6s. 9½d. From 1838 to 1844 the amount was 82,661*l.*, and a further sum of 52,879*l.* was required for further works. The property belonging to the bridge only realizes 7,464*l.* 11s. 8d. a year.

SPECULATION IN RAILWAY SHARES.—It is rumoured that the committee of the Stock Exchange are about to make a resolution that all scrip transactions (excepting, of course, registered shares) shall be dealt in only for money—one of the wisest means yet suggested to cure the evils of rash speculations in railway shares.

Mr. Alderman Farebrother, the auctioneer of London, has inspected the prisons and barracks at Dartmoor, by the direction of the Government, previous to their being submitted for sale, which we understand will be in less than a fortnight.

Tithes Commutation.—A return has just been issued of agreements made for the commutation of tithe and of awards, with their amounts to be paid in lieu of tithes. It appears that the total rent charges, in lieu of tithes, amounted on the 1st of July last to as much as 1,088,282*l.* 8s. 11½d.

Bath.—We hear that the justly-admired tower on Lansdown, erected by the late W. Beckford, esq and the lands adjoining, are to be sold by order of his executors.

This Company will transact all the usual business of Assurance Companies, and in so doing will take advantage of the modern improvements which have been engrafted into the systems of Assurance, the result of the long-tested experience of old-established Offices for the Assurance of Lives.

Thus, Assurances will be granted upon the payment of one single Premium, or of Annual Premiums, or upon a limited number of payments, on a gradually decreasing or increasing scale, all of which payments may be made half-yearly, or quarterly, if more convenient.

Assurances will likewise be granted from 5,000*l.* downwards to any amount, thus opening the door of Assurance to many persons who have hitherto found it inaccessible.

The Company will also undertake the purchasing of contingent and reversionary Property, the granting of immediate Survivorships and Deferred Annuities, as also, the endowment of Widows and Children. It will likewise advance money on annuity, mortgage, or other security.

The multifarious operations connected with Life Assurance; for instance, the opportunities afforded to Husbands and Fathers of making a provision, after their death, for their Widows and Children; to Creditors, to compensate the loss which the death of their Debtors might occasion; in Marriage Contracts, to secure the terms of Settlement; to the possessors of Entailed Estates, to provide for the younger branches of their families; to persons possessed of Life Interest in Property, to provide for their relatives in case of their decease; to expectants of Property in Reversion, to insure a portion of it against contingencies; together with many other instances which might be enumerated, seem, of late years, to be better understood than formerly. It is with a view to facilitate these operations that the SOVEREIGN LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY has been formed; and it will be found that it offers to the public a new system of Loans, more beneficial to the Borrower, and yielding a better return to the Shareholder, than any system at present in use.

Thus, any person effecting an Assurance with this Company, can borrow THE FULL AMOUNT of the sum secured by the Policy, upon giving collateral security for the payment of the Premium, and interest on the loan, for a limited number of years, and will not, as in ordinary cases, be liable to be called upon to repay, in one sum and by a given day, the principal money lent.

In order to effect this, the Borrower will pay an increased rate of premium, beyond what would be required for the ordinary Assurance of his Life, which increased rate, together with the accumulations by way of interest, which the operations of the Company will enable it to realize, will, in effect, repay the principal sum to the Company in any given number of years, at the option of the borrower, who will, at the expiration of such period, be relieved from all further payments in respect of the Loan, and will, moreover, hold a Policy with the Company, of some years' duration, which he can, if he chooses, continue for the benefit of his family, or for the purpose of raising a future Loan, at the ordinary rate at which he would have been entitled to it at the time of the commencement of the original Loan.

In case the Borrower should die during the continuance of the Loan, he will not leave his property encumbered with a debt; but, on the contrary, his representatives will be entitled to receive the amount secured by the Policy, after deducting a sum equal to the unliquidated portion of the Loan. Or if, at any time, he should wish to pay off the Loan to the Society, he can do so upon advantageous terms.

For example, a person aged twenty-five, who wishes to borrow 100*l.* to be liquidated in fifteen years, will have to insure in the Society to the amount of the Loan, and will pay an Annual Premium for such Assurance of 7*l.* 9s. 10d. in addition to 5 per cent. interest upon the Loan, making a total annual payment of 12*l.* 9s. 10d. for fifteen years only. It is obvious that the longer the period during which the Premiums are payable, the smaller will they be in amount.

Should the Borrower survive the period for which the Loan is contracted, he will, by these payments, have liquidated the principal sum lent, and will possess a Policy of some years' duration for 100*l.* which he can, if he chooses, continue at the ordinary rate of Premium.

If, on the other hand, the Borrower should die within the period assigned for the continuance of the Loan, say in the tenth year, he will not leave his property incumbered with a debt of 100*l.*; but, on the contrary, his representatives will be entitled to receive 61*l.* 12s. 9d. the then value of his Policy.

Or again: if at the same time (during the tenth year), he should desire to pay off his Loan, he will have to pay to the Society no more than 38*l.* 7s. 3d. and, still retaining his interest in the Policy, will be discharged from all further payments beyond the ordinary rate of Assurance.

The examples above given are deduced from the Tables of the Society, a reference to which will shew the relative Premiums payable at different ages for Loans of different durations.

It may be observed, also, that persons who have no desire to retain an interest in their Policies for the benefit of their relations, can insure at a much lower rate than persons who, as in the above examples, retain an interest in their Policies, both during the continuance, and after the termination of the period for which the Loans are contracted.

The advantages which this system offers to persons requiring temporary Loans, or wishing to pay off existing charges on their property are numerous, and only require to be fully known to be duly appreciated. First of all, the Borrower in this Society will be saved the expense of frequent transfers, as is the case with those who borrow from the usual sources; for he can in no case be required to pay off the Loan, except in the manner proposed, although, if he chooses, he can do so upon most advantageous terms to himself. Secondly, he has no apprehension in case of his death, of leaving a sum to be paid by his surviving relations, or to remain as a charge upon his property, for the Policy repays that portion of the Loan remaining unpaid in case of death; and, whenever that event may happen, he is certain that his family will reap some, and perhaps great, advantages from the Policy which he holds in the Society. And lastly, this system enables the Company to accept securities which would not be available for the purposes of ordinary Loans, inasmuch as the only security required is for the punctual payment of the Premium and Interest, and not for the principal sum lent. It is needless to remark, that many persons can furnish security, in the manner proposed, who could not provide it for repayment of the whole principal money by a given day.

For example a person desirous of entering into business, but deficient in the funds wherewith to do so, can, by effecting a loan for a given number of years,—paying in the meantime a premium out of his profits, which the loan from the company has been the means of realizing,—supply himself with the necessary capital to commence with, and thus lay a foundation for a prosperous business and an ultimate independency. Again, a person desirous of purchasing the house in which he resides, or one more suitable to him, can borrow of the Company the purchase-money, and by paying a Premium for a limited time, instead of rent to his landlord, will after the termination of such limited period, be the absolute owner of the property free from rent. And lastly, in all cases of settlements on marriage, compositions of debts, arrangements with creditors, &c., a person can avail himself of the advantages offered by this Company, to obviate the first great difficulty attendant in many cases upon such transactions, viz. the want of ready money,—which deficiency, the experience of many can prove, has often rendered nugatory those efforts, which, in all probability, would otherwise have been crowned with success.

In addition, however, to the large number of Assurances which may be expected for the immediate purpose of raising loans, an equal inducement is held out to persons desirous of effecting Assurances, whose object is to provide for their relatives, and who may not, at the time they effect the Assurance, require a Loan.

By assuring with this Company persons will not only effectually provide for their families in case of death, but, at the same time, will furnish themselves with the means at any period of life, on any emergency or reverse of circumstances, of raising a Loan to the amount of their Policy, at the rate of Premium, in respect of their Life Assurance, on which the Policy was originally granted; thus securing to those who effect Assurances unconnected with Loans, the whole of the advantages of the system of Loan proposed by this Company, whenever they have occasion to avail themselves of it.

The profits of the Company will appertain to two classes of members, the proprietors of shares and the assured. The profits arising from the Loan Department, and the policies connected therewith, together with a small proportion of the profits arising out of the Assurances unconnected with Loans (by way of remuneration to the Shareholders for guaranteeing out of their capital, in case of need, the payment of Assurances falling due), will, after paying interest upon the paid-up Capital of the Company, be divided amongst the holders of shares in the Company. Three-fourths of the profits arising from the Assurance Department, unconnected with Loans, will be divided amongst the parties, either originally effecting Assurances, or who shall hold Assurances after the liquidation of their Loans. This distribution holds out to the Shareholder, in addition to interest upon the capital invested in shares, the prospect of a large remuneration; as also to the assured, an ample participation in the profits arising from the payment of premiums; which must necessarily be augmented, by the falling in of Policies into the Assurance Department, after the liquidation of the Loans originally granted upon them. The Assured, also, will have the security of a large subscribed guarantee Capital, to meet their claims upon the Company.

Prospectuses containing specimens of the Tables and every information can be obtained from, and applications for shares, in the annexed Form, made to, the Secretary, at the Company's Offices, No. 5, St. James's-street, London; Messrs. LORD CHANCELLOR'S COURT.

SWALLOW v. DAY.

Practice—Supplemental answer—Swearing answer—Time.

Prendergast, by the direction of Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce, applied to the Lord Chancellor that the defendant might be permitted to swear to his supplemental answer in open court, under these circumstances:—The defendant had obtained an order permitting him to put in a supplemental answer to correct a mistake made in his first answer, and the supplemental answer was to be put in within a week. In consequence of delay in the office, the order had not been passed, and although the time expired that day, the officer of the court held that he had no power to swear the defendant to his supplemental answer until the order had been passed and entered. The Vice-Chancellor, on application made to him to swear the defendant in open court, thought that, under the particular circumstances, the defendant might be so sworn; but as there was no precedent for such a course, his Honour required the authority of the Lord Chancellor on any course which might be adopted.

The LORD CHANCELLOR at first said he could not establish a new practice; but, subsequently, on the suggestion of Mr. Colville, the registrar, allowed the order to be passed in court, and directed that the proper officer should then swear the defendant and receive the supplemental answer on the order so passed.

GACHES v. WARNER.

Practice—Dismissal of bill for want of prosecution—Order to enter an order nunc pro tunc—Undertaking to speed.

After the cause is at issue, no motion to dismiss the bill for want of prosecution can be made, but the defendant must take the necessary steps to bring the cause to a hearing in case the plaintiff should neglect so to do.

When a subpœna to rejoin has been served, the cause is at issue, and no motion to dismiss can consequently be made.

The original bill in this suit was filed on the 30th of August, 1836, and various proceedings were had in the cause up to Hilary Term 1838. On the 13th of January, 1838, the plaintiffs filed a bill of revivor and supplement, and in March following the defendants, Charles Warner, George Platel, and Henry Freeman, put in their answers to the last-mentioned bill.

In July, 1838, the plaintiffs obtained an order for the defendant Platel to produce, for the plaintiffs' inspection, certain documents; but some difference having arisen between the parties upon the minutes of that order, a motion was made by Platel on the 29th of November, 1838, to rectify the minutes, when the minutes were settled by the Court, and the order directed to be dated as of that day. The documents were deposited, and the plaintiffs having taken no step in the cause, a motion was made on the 22nd o Dec. 1842, on the part of the defendants Warner, Platel, and Freeman, to dismiss the bill as against them; but the plaintiff having filed a replication subsequently to the notice of motion, the application to dismiss the bill was refused. The plaintiffs having taken no other step in the cause, the same defendants, on the 1st of July, 1843, served another notice of motion to dismiss the bill for want of prosecution. On the 5th of July the plaintiffs' counsel gave an undertaking to speed the causes, and the order usual in such cases was made by the Vice-Chancellor of England. This order was not then entered; but the plaintiff served subpœnas to rejoin, and also an order for a commission to examine witnesses. The plaintiffs had not sued out any commission, or taken any further step in the causes; and on the 11th of November, 1844, the same defendants again served a notice of motion to dismiss the bill for want of prosecution. On the 12th of November the order of the 5th July, 1843, was entered, but no copy of an order to enter the same nunc pro tunc was served upon the plaintiffs' agents. That motion was heard before the Vice-Chancellor of England on the 22nd of Nov. 1844, and was refused, with costs. From that order the defendants appealed to the Lord Chancellor.

Anderdon, for the defendants, in support of the appeal, contended that the plaintiff having filed the replication within time, and paid the costs of the first motion to dismiss, had got rid of that motion altogether. The defendants were therefore now entitled to move to dismiss the bill for want of prosecution. The order nunc pro tunc cured any irregularity caused by the delay in entering the order of 5th July, 1843. He cited Dixon v. Shelm (18 Ves. 520); 2 Daniell's Chancery Practice, 366; 1 Smith's Chancery Practice, 332; Findlay v. Wood (1 Ves. & Bea. 499); Wilson v. Simpson (2 Mad. 123); Skip v. Warner (ib. 558).

Wakefield and G. L. Russell, for the respondent (the plaintiff), contended that no order to speed existed on the 11th of November, when the notice of motion was given, inasmuch until an order is passed and entered it has no effect, and that the order to enter the order of the 5th of July, 1843, nunc pro tunc, not having been served upon the plaintiff, it was not complete. The 16th and 17th of the new orders did not apply, therefore all the proceedings were under the old practice, and that, under that practice no motion to dismiss for want of prosecution can be made after the service of a subpœna to rejoin. They cited and referred to Tozer v. Tozer (1 Cox, 188); Anon. (5 Sim. 497); Lewis v. Hinton (8 Jur. 153); 1 Newland's Harrison, 315, ed. 1808; 1 Smith's Ch. Prac. 24[illegible]; Smith v. Thompson (4 Mad. 179); Harrison Ch. Pr. 240.

Anderdon, in reply.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—I am of opinion this case does not come within the new orders (16th and 17th orders of 1831). In this case a motion to dismiss the bill for want of prosecution was made, and an undertaking to speed the cause to a hearing was given, and before any thing had been done subpœnas to rejoin were served. The cause was then at issue. A second motion to dismiss the bill for want of prosecution having been made, the question is, whether such a motion could properly be made. I am of opinion that such a motion cannot be made. The decision of the Vice-Chancellor is quite consistent with the case of Tozer v. Tozer, and that case is not disputed. What, then, is the effect of a subpœna to rejoin, but to put the cause at issue, and after the cause is at issue, the defendant cannot move to dismiss the bill for want of prosecution after the cause is at issue. The case of Tozer v. Tozer is an express decision to that effect, and that case is not disputed. That is a direct authority. There is also the certificate of Mr. Jackson as to the practice of the Court. It appears, therefore, as well upon principle as upon the authority of the case of Tozer v. Tozer, and the certificate of Mr. Jackson, that such an application to dismiss as the present cannot be made. I am of opinion that the Vice-Chancellor has come to a correct conclusion, and the application must be refused with costs.

MALINS v. PRICE.

Taxation of costs—New trial—Copies of short-hand writer's notes—Costs—Practice.

Where a motion is made for a new trial by counsel not present at the trial, one copy of the short-hand writer's notes of the trial will be allowed in the taxation of costs. Statement of the course of practice in that respect adopted by the Courts of Common Law.

This case, with the first opinion expressed thereon by the Lord Chancellor, is reported in the LAW TIMES of the 9th of August, but a pressure of engagements has prevented an earlier report of the judgment finally pronounced.

JUDGMENT.

July 31.—The LORD CHANCELLOR.—In this case a report has been made to me by Mr. Follett, one of the most able and experienced officers of the court, and he thinks the expense to the parties will, in most cases, be less by allowing the costs of a copy of the short-hand writer's note for counsel upon a motion for a new trial than by disallowing as of course such costs. I think where the counsel who move for a new trial were not present at the trial, one copy of the short-hand writer's notes of what occurred upon that trial should be allowed, otherwise the solicitor must state to the Court what took place, which is not a convenient course; and I think, therefore, one copy of the shorthand writer's notes should be allowed. I think in this case that a copy of the judge's charge should also be allowed. The judge used part of these notes in summing up, his own notes being very imperfect, and it is necessary that the parties should be correctly informed of what took place. Two copies were allowed by the taxing-master; it was a case of considerable complexity, and, I think, it should go back to the Master in this shape; to say how much of the evidence given on the trial was merely formal, and the Master should inquire what part of the short-hand writer's notes, in a fair view of the case, ought to be allowed for use on the motion for a new trial.

I have now received replies from the taxing-masters of the Courts of Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer, in answer to the further inquiries I directed to be made.

The practice of the Queen's Bench generally appeared to be not to allow copies of short-hand writer's notes on motions for new trials; it being considered that some of the counsel in the cause knew what took place upon the trial. But where notes had been taken in peculiar cases, copies have been allowed. The matter was, however, deemed to be within the discretion of the taxing-master.

In the Common Pleas there is no uniform practice as to the allowance on motions for new trials of the cost of copies of the short-hand writer's notes; sometimes a copy of a portion of the evidence upon the trial was allowed as a part of the brief of counsel in any important question.

In the Exchequer, the copies of the short-hand writer's notes are not usually allowed; but on motions for new trials the Master exercises a discretion as to the allowance of copies of such of the evidence as he deems proper.

The report by the officer of this court, to which I have referred, is as follows: "I consider it to be the practice, on application for new trial of an issue at law, to allow, as between party and party, the costs of employing three counsel; that is to say, the two counsel in the cause in equity, and to allow for the use of the counsel in equity and one of the counsel engaged at law, copies of any notes which have been made, whether by counsel or by the attorney, or by a short-hand writer, of the evidence and other proceedings of the trial. I understand that there was formerly a good deal of difference of opinion as to what were the proper costs upon such occasions; but that about twelve or fourteen years ago a case arose, in which Mr. Wainwright was clerk in court on one side, and Mr. Sydney Smith on the other; that they referred the case to Mr. Mills, who, after communicating with the solicitors, and consulting with Mr. Jackson and others, decided the practice to be as above stated, and the costs were settled accordingly. These cases are not of frequent occurrence, and I do not myself recollect any instance of such a taxation occurring to me, either while I was in practice or since; but I understand from several of my colleagues, to whom such cases have occurred, that the practice since the period above mentioned has been uniformly acted upon; and I find, by reference to the bill of costs in Ansdell v. Gomperts, taxed in 1837, which I have procured from Sir Giffin Wilson's office, that the costs of the short-hand writer's notes were there allowed, on the taxation, between party and party. The reason of the rule of allowance I take to be this; the common law counsel engaged on the trial would have his own brief, on which he must be presumed to have made sufficient notes for his own use. But the counsel who was not engaged on the trial would have no brief, nor any knowledge whatever of the case, except the brief delivered to him for the motion. This brief must necessarily contain either a statement, prepared for the purpose, of what took place on the trial, or a copy of some document already existing containing that information. The practice is, therefore, to deliver to the equity counsel copies of any notes which may be in existence of the proceedings on the trial, such notes, as the case may be, being taken by the counsel or by the attorney, or, as more frequently happens, by a short-hand writer; of course the costs of employing a short-hand writer are not allowed, but only the same charge of 3s. 4d. a sheet for copying his notes, as would be charged for copying the notes of the counsel, or of any other document. And it should be borne in mind that if, instead of copies of notes of evidence, the solicitor had to prepare a statement by way of brief for his counsel, the charge would be 6s. 8d. a sheet for drawing such statement, over and above the charge of 3s. 4d. for copying it. I have spoken to all the other taxing-masters on the subject, and I may add that we are unanimous in opinion that, assuming the case to be one properly requiring that the counsel should be instructed as to the proceedings on the trial, the costs of the copies of the short-hand writer's notes, for the counsel not one gaged on the trial, ought, according to the practice of this court, to be allowed."

I cannot help thinking there is a great deal of good sense in the reason given for the allowance of such copies of evidence in a court of equity. It is the duty of the attorney to lay before counsel the most perfect statement he can of the whole of the evidence, and he would most naturally resort to the short-hand writer's notes, exercising, of course, a discretion as to the parts which he inserts being essential to the support of his client's case.

I observed on a former occasion that the question at issue on the trial was a peculiar and complicated one, and I think this is a case in which it is proper that some allowance should be made for copies of the short-hand writer's notes of the evidence on the trial, and if so, to what extent. After the above certificate as to the practice, the matter must go back to the taxing-master, to inquire whether this is such a case as, in his opinion, would be proper to use copies of short-hand writer's notes, and to what extent, and to tax the costs accordingly. My experience has led me to know that it is most important for a judge of this court to know what the question and answer were with a view to a full understanding of the effect of the evidence as taken by the judge, in whose notes the question and answer are generally incorporated. In this case two copies should probably be allowed; but two copies cannot be necessary in all cases. A motion for a new trial must be on a question of law; and some times copies of such notes can only be partially necessary, at other times not at all. The allowance must be a matter of discretion in each case. In this case a part of the short-hand writer's notes was used by the judge, and it is quite clear that counsel must have been furnished with that part of it.

The costs of the present application must be reserved.

The order of the Vice-Chancellor was overruled.

ROLLS COURT.

January 21, 27, and April 17.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. THE CORPORATION OF LONDON.

Construction of stat.* 5 Vict. c. 5—*Jurisdiction—Privilege of the Crown.

The operation of the stat. 5 Vict. c. 5, is to transfer from the Court of Exchequer to the Court of Chancery all the jurisdiction of the former (sitting as a court of revenue or otherwise) which was exercised or exercisable by it as a court of equity, and to leave every thing to the Court of Exchequer which was not exercised or exercisable by it as a court of equity.

The Crown had, for matters of revenue, a right to sue on either the equity or law side of the Court of Exchequer; and the equity jurisdiction being now transferred to the Court of Chancery by the 5 Vict. c. 5, the Crown may sue in the latter court as it might have done in the equity side of the former.

A demurrer for want of equity to an information by the Attorney-General, claiming a right to the soil and bed of the river Thames, to which the Corporation of London considered themselves entitled, was overruled.

This was an information filed ex officio by her Majesty's Attorney-General against the Corporation of London and others; and it prayed that the rights of her Majesty and the corporation respectively in the matters in the information mentioned might be ascertained, if necessary, by directing issues to be tried at law, and until they should be ascertained, the defendant, Cubitt, should be restrained from making the embankments in the information mentioned; and if the corporation had no good title to the bed and soil of the river Thames, that the making of the said embankments should be perpetually restrained, and those made be abated as nuisances; that an account of the rents, fines, &c. received by the corporation should be taken, and the balance, after all just allowances, be paid to her Majesty; and that, to avoid multiplicity of suits, the right to the bed and soil of the river be declared to be in her Majesty. The information stated that, by the royal prerogative, the ground and soil of the coasts and shores of the seas round this kingdom, and of every port, &c. and navigable river into which the sea ebbs and flows, and the shore lying between high water and low water mark at ordinary tides, belong to her Majesty; and that her Majesty, and her progenitors time out of mind, is and have been seised, in right of the Crown of England, of and in the port and haven of London and of the river Thames; and that the same river is also, and from time immemorial has been, an ancient royal and navigable river and king's highway for all purposes, with their ships, &c. to pass and repass, and navigate at their free will and pleasure, and to moor their vessels in convenient parts of the river not impeding the navigation. It then stated, that the mayor or corporation of London, by prescription, or some grant from the Crown, held and exercised the office of bailiff or conservator of the Thames from above Staines to a certain place called Yealand, otherwise Yeuleet or Yantleet, towards the sea, for the purpose of preventing the raising of obstructions and nuisances in the river; but had no right to the bed or soil of the river; but that they had of late claimed to be entitled not only to exercise the office of bailiff or conservator, but to be seised or otherwise well entitled to the freehold of the ground, bed, and so of the river, and of the shores thereof between high and low water-mark, within the above-mentioned limits, and had assumed to exercise acts of ownership not warranted by their office of bailiff. The information then stated in particular, that by an indenture of the 3rd of May, 1843, made between the corporation and William Cubitt, they granted to Cubitt, for a consideration, their license to embank a portion the soil of the north side of the river in front of the Isle of Dogs, and that Cubitt was preparing to execute the embankment. It further stated, that by an indenture of the 20th of April, 1843, the corporation granted Sir Thomas Turton and others a license to raise an embankment in front of Durland's wharf, in Rotherhithe, and that he had commenced to embank accordingly. It also stated an indenture of the 16th of May, 1843, whereby the corporation granted to John Cornelius Park a license to embank in front of a piece of land of his own, in the parish of Battersea and that he was proceeding to make an embankment accordingly. These embankments were stated to be detrimental to the river Thames, and a nuisance and injury to her Majesty's subjects navigating the same, inasmuch as they created eddies, and caused a deposit of mud at each end, and were also injurious to the river below their locality, by excluding a portion of the tidal water requisite for the scour of the river. The information charged that no charter or letters patent given by any of her Majesty's predecessors contained any grant of the soil or bed of the river Thames, or of the shores thereof between high and low water mark. To this information, which contained the usual claim to discovery, and prayed to the effect before mentioned, the defendants, the corporation of London put in a demurrer and answer. The latter in effect denied that any of the embankments were a common nuisance, or in any way tended to the injury of the river, to the hurt or damage of her Majesty's subjects navigating the same; and so much of the bill as was not founded on such alleged injury hurt, or damage, was demurred to for want of equity.

JUDGMENT.

April 17.—The MASTER OF THE ROLLS stated the facts of the case, and proceeded:—In the view which I take of this case, it does not appear to me to be necessary very accurately to inquire whether or no any part of that which, according to the admissions of the defendants, ought to be answered, is covered by the demurrer. I will assume that the demurrer and the answer are properly framed, so as to bring the question really in agitation between the parties fairly under consideration. In support of the demurrer it was argued that, as between the Crown and the City of London, the right to the ground, bed, and shores of the river Thames is a matter which ought to be tried in a court of law, and ought not to be brought into a court of equity. It is said that the matter of this information, where we exclude all that relates to the alleged nuisance which is denied by the answer, would not have been a proper subject of jurisdiction on the equity side of the Court of Exchequer; but if that should seem otherwise, it is still said not to be a proper subject of the jurisdiction of this Court, because in such a matter as this, the equity jurisdiction of the Court of Exchequer has not been effectually transferred to this court by the stat. 5 Vict. c. 5, s. 1. By that statute it is enacted, "that all the power, authority, and jurisdiction of her Majesty's Court of Exchequer at Westminster, as a court of equity, and all the power, authority, and jurisdiction which shall have been conferred on or committed to the said Court of Exchequer by or under the special authority of any Act or Acts of Parliament (other than such power, authority, and jurisdiction as shall then be possessed by or incident to the said Court of Exchequer as a court of law, or as shall then be possessed by the said Court of Exchequer as a court of revenue, and not heretofore exercised or exercisable by the said Court sitting as a court of equity), shall be transferred to her Majesty's high Court of Chancery to all intents and purposes;" and I think that the almost unavoidable construction of the Act makes it so operate as to leave to the Court of Exchequer every thing that was not exercised or exercisable by that Court as a court of equity, and to transfer to the Court of Chancery all that was exercised or exercisable by the said Court of Exchequer as a court of equity. As the Act was first framed, and as it passed the House of Lords in the year 1840, the words within the parenthesis are these,—"Other than such power, authority, and jurisdiction as shall then be possessed by or incident to the said Court of Exchequer, as a court of law or as a court of revenue;" and if those words had remained unaltered, the Court of Exchequer would, as a court of revenue, have retained an equity jurisdiction. But the other words, which were added in the year 1841, and which are now found in the Act, confine the jurisdiction excepted from the operation of the Act to that jurisdiction which was not exercised or exercisable by the same Court sitting as a Court of equity. The jurisdiction of the Court of Exchequer as a court of revenue remains, except as to that part of it which was exercised or exercisable by the same Court as a court of equity. I confess that I am unable to construe the Act so as to give it any other effect or operation. If this operation is different from the intention, or if it be productive of inconvenience, it appears to me that the Legislature alone can afford a remedy. The Courts can only deal with the words of an Act as they stand; they have nothing to do with the object and intentions of the persons by whom a statute was first proposed or introduced into Parliament. They must collect the objects and intentions of the Legislature from the words of the statute; and upon those words, in the present case, I think that if the Court of Exchequer, sitting in equity, had jurisdiction, the same jurisdiction is now vested in this Court. If this be so, the real question in the case is whether that part of the information which is demurred to is such as would, before the statute, have been decreed to be within the jurisdiction of the Court of Exchequer on the equity side thereof. The question is not whether there was any such jurisdiction in cases between subject and subject; it may be admitted that there was not. But this is the case of an information affecting the rights, property, and revenue of the Crown; and the question is, whether the Court of Exchequer, sitting on the equity side, had not jurisdiction, although the Crown might have a legal remedy, or have been entitled to maintain an information at law for the same matters; for the question will be whether the Crown, having a remedy by legal information, might not also have a remedy by information in equity addressed to a Court having jurisdiction and authority to provide that all questions of legal right should be put into a proper train of legal investigation and decision. Or again, the question may, perhaps, be stated thus, whether, in a revenue cause necessarily or properly brought to the Court of Exchequer as a court of revenue, the Crown had or had not the option to inform the Court of the matters in question either on the law side or on the equity side of the court. If the Crown had such an option, I am of opinion it is not extinguished by the Act transferring the equity jurisdiction to this Court. It cannot, indeed, be exercised in the same way between the legal and equitable sides of the same court of revenue, but it appears to me that it still remains, and has to be exercised between the legal jurisdiction of the Court of Exchequer, as a court of revenue, and the jurisdiction of this Court as transferred to it by the Act, in consequence of its having been possessed by the Court of Exchequer, and exercised or exercisable by the same Court, sitting as a court of equity. Upon the question whether this jurisdiction was exercised by the Court of Exchequer sitting as a court of revenue, I own that, after examining the authorities, I conceive myself to be bound by them. After the case of The Attorney-General of the Prince of Wales v. Sir John St. Aubyn, decided against the learned and able, though somewhat warm argument of Mr. Baron Wood, which was so much relied on, and the two cases of Sutton Pool, which were there commented upon, besides other authorities there referred to, I think I am not entitled, upon any fancy or notion of my own, to say that the Queen, having her Court of Exchequer as a court of revenue, and at the same time a court both of law and of equity, had not, for matters of revenue, a right to sue on either side of the court. Upon the authority of those cases, and some others which were cited in the argument, and which I have read, I am of opinion that for the matters now in question her Majesty had a right to sue on the equity side of the Court of Exchequer, and that the jurisdiction of that Court being transferred to this, her Majesty has now a right to sue here. In the case of The Attorney-General of the Prince of Wales v. Sir John St. Aubyn, Mr. Baron Graham relied not only on authority, but stated some reasons worthy of consideration why, in such cases, the Queen ought to have the right to inquire, by the oath of the party, into his adverse title, and also endeavoured to shew that, whether distinctly alleged or not, there must necessarily be, in cases of this nature, a confusion of boundaries, which would of itself give a jurisdiction to a court of equity. I do not, however, enter into these considerations, being satisfied that I could not allow this demurrer without either acting in contradiction to the cases I have mentioned, which I think I have no authority to do, or deciding that the equity jurisdiction which the Court of Exchequer had in this matter has not been transferred to this Court; and I am unable to give that construction to the words of the Act of Parliament. For these reasons I think that this demurrer must be overruled.

RICABE v. GARWOOD.

Will—Construction—Taking per stirpes or per capita.

A bequest was made after a certain event, "to, between, or among E. P. if she should be then living, but if she should be then dead, then to, between, or among the children of E. P. and the children of T. R. share and share alike." E. P. was living when the event happened.

Held, that E. P. and the children of T. R. took the bequest equally among them, and that E. P. should have only as much as one of T. R.'s children.

This was a petition for the payment out of court of certain moneys to parties entitled thereto; but in reference to one sum, the opinion of the Court was taken as to the construction of the will of the testatrix in the cause. After having given a sum on trust for Elizabeth Smith, for life, and after her death to Thomas Ricabe, the plaintiff, for life, then, after the death of the survivor, the testatrix gave the same sum "to, between, or among Elizabeth Pye, the wife of H. Pye, if she should be then living, but if she should be then dead, then to, between, or among the children of Elizabeth Pye and the children of Thomas Ricabe, share and share alike." Elizabeth Pye survived Elizabeth Smith and Thomas Ricabe, and the sum in question was now claimed by Elizabeth Pye and the children of T. Ricabe.

Chandless, for the children of Thomas Ricabe, contended that it should be divided between E. Pye and the children of T. Ricabe, equally, so as to give each of the children as much as E. Pye, and not to allow a division per stirpes, so as to give E. Pye a moiety of the fund. He cited Dowding v. Smith (3 Beav. 541).

Temple, for Mrs. Pye, contended that Mrs. Pye took the whole sum. The testatrix gave the sum "to, between, and among E. Pye, if she should be then living." The preposition "to" is absolute; but the words "between and among" are difficult to deal with; but she was about to make the bequest to her sister's children and Thomas Ricabe's children, and applied the words "between or among" to them, while she used the word "to" as applying to Mrs. Pye herself. But the children of Thomas Ricabe, in that view of the matter, take nothing, if Mrs. Pye survive the life tenants, as she has done, the word "to" applying to E. Pye absolutely. But it is desired to give the fund to E. Pye and the children of T. Ricabe; if so, let her represent her children as Thomas Ricabe does his, and let her take half the fund. The words "share and share alike" only apply in the case of E. Pye and T. Ricabe being set aside. He cited Brett v. Horton (4 Beav. 239).

Chandless, in reply.

The MASTER of the ROLLS.—The first thing to be done in these cases is to try to find out the intention of the testator, which it is sometimes not an easy matter to do. There is a difficulty in construing the sentence giving the bequest; but, however, I cannot construe it as asked by the counsel for Mrs. Pye. The words are "to, between or among," &c. Now, the words "to, between," &c. seem to imply restriction; and I cannot do otherwise than think that the testatrix meant distribution between E. Pye and some one, and that she intended distribution between E. Pye and the children of Thomas Ricabe; or if E. Pye should be dead, between the children of the two. Now, the most direct way of effecting that intention would have been to express it; but though she has not, I cannot help thinking she meant it. She does not finish the sentence, but resumes and uses the same words. The plain intention is to substitute the children of E. Pye, if she should be dead, to share with those of T. Ricabe. The fund must go between E. Pye and the children of T. Ricabe equally, so as to take per capita.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

HAMMOND v. COLLS.

To a plea setting forth a breach of a covenant in a lease not to assign without license, it was alleged that the plaintiff did set over and part with the indenture and the term thereby created, and his, the plaintiff's interest therein, within the true intent and meaning of the said lease, to wit, by pawning, pledging, and mortgaging the said indenture of lease, to and with certain creditors of him, the plaintiff, to wit, one R. W. and one F. B. without the special license of the defendant. The plaintiff replied that he did not set over or part with the said indenture of lease, or the term thereby created, or his, the plaintiff's, interest therein, within the true intent and meaning of the said lease, by pawning, pledging, or mortgaging the indenture of lease to and with the said supposed creditors of the plaintiff or either of them, modo et formâ.

Held, that the replication was bad, as being too large a traverse.

The plaintiff covenanted in a lease not to take more than two crops of grain in succession, and that he would, amongst other things, plant with potatoes, or sow with peas or beans twice well hoed. The defendant pleaded, as a breach of this covenant, that the plaintiff took more than two crops of grain successively, and did not nor would plant with potatoes, nor sow with peas which were twice well hoed. The replication traversed that the plaintiff took more than two crops of grain successively, and alleged that the plaintiff did plant part of the land, consisting of, &c. with potatoes, and did sow another part, consisting of, &c. with peas, and the residue, consisting of, &c. with beans which were twice well hoed.

Held, that as the plea shewed no breach of the latter part of the covenant, the replication was a sufficient answer to the material matter alleged in the plea.

The pleadings are fully set forth in the judgment of the Court.

The case was argued in Trinity Term last by Channell and Shee, Serjts. for the defendant, and Manning, Serjt. for the plaintiff, when the following authorities were cited:

For the defendant,—Comyn's Digest, Pleader, G, 15; Regil v. Green (1 M. & W. 328); Stubbs v. Lainson (1 M. & W. 728); Moore v. Boulcott (1 Bing. N. C. 323); Turnley v. M'Gregor (1 Dowl. & L. 506).

For the plaintiff,—Sir Francis Leake's case (Dyer, 365); Robinson v. Turner (6 Jurist, 368).

Cur. adv. vult.

JUDGMENT.

TINDAL, C. J.—This was an action of trespass, for breaking and entering into a certain field, demised to the plaintiff by James Esdaile for a term of twenty-one years, from Michaelmas 1839, and cutting and carrying away the crops, &c. The defendant pleaded several pleas, in one of which is set out a lease by James Esdaile to the plaintiff, which lease contained a covenant by the plaintiff that he would not at any time during the said term of twenty-one years, sow, crop, or take off or from the said arable land demised, or any part thereof, more than two crops of any sort of corn or grain in succession, but would every third year summer fallow or lay the said arable lands down with rye-grass and clover-seeds in husband-like manner, or would plant with potatoes, or sow with peas or beans twice well hoed; and also that he, the plaintiff, his executors or administrators, should not at any time during the said term of twenty-one years, by the said indenture demised, let, set, demise, lease, assign, or set over or otherwise part with the premises thereby demised, or any part thereof, to any person or persons whomsoever, without the special license and consent of the said James Esdaile, his heirs and assigns, in writing; and there was a power of re-entry for breach of any covenant in the lease. The plea then set out the release and reversion to the defendant. The eighth plea, after referring to the lease granted to the plaintiff, and the release and reversion to the defendant, averred that, after the making of those several indentures, and long before the said several times, when, &c. the plaintiff did set over and part with the said indenture of lease, and the term thereby created, and his, the plaintiff's, interest therein, within the true intent and meaning of the said indenture of lease, and the proviso and condition for re-entry therein contained, to wit, by pawning, pledging, and mortgaging the said indenture of lease to and with certain creditors of him, the plaintiff, to wit, one Robert Watson and one Francis Broughton, without the special license or consent in writing of the said James Esdaile, or of the defendant. Lastly, the defendant pleaded that, during the said lease of twenty-one years, he, the plaintiff, did sow, receive, and take off and from divers, to wit, fifty acres of the arable lands demised, and off and from every part thereof, more than two crops of corn successively, to wit, three crops of wheat successively; and the plaintiff did not, nor would, every third year, or at any other time, or in any other manner, summer fallow or lay the said arable lands, or any part thereof, down with rye-grass and clover-seeds in a husband-like or in any other manner, nor would plant with potatoes, nor sow with peas which were twice, or at all, well or in any other manner hoed, contrary to the covenant in the said indenture of lease, &c. The plaintiff replied to the eighth plea, that he did not set over or part with the said indenture of lease, or the term thereby created, or his, the plaintiff's, interest therein, within the true intent and meaning of the said lease, by pawning, pledging, or mortgaging the indenture of lease to and with the said supposed creditors of him, the plaintiff, in that behalf mentioned, or either of them, in manner and form as in the eighth plea is alleged. To the last plea the plaintiff replied that he did not, at any time during the said term of twenty-one years, sow, crop, receive, or take off or from the said arable lands, or any or either of them, or any part thereof, more than two crops of any sort of corn or grain successively; and did every third year summer fallow a part, consisting of divers, to wit, fifty acres of the said arable lands; and did lay down with rye-grass and clover-seeds, in a husband-like manner, another part, consisting of divers, to wit, fifty other acres of the said arable lands; and did plant another part, consisting of divers, to wit, fifty other acres of the said arable lands, with potatoes; and did sow another part, consisting of divers, to wit, fifty other acres of the said arable lands, with peas; and divers, to wit, the residue of the said arable lands, consisting, to wit, of fifty other acres of the said arable lands, with beans which were twice well hoed, &c. The defendant demurred to the replication to the eighth plea, on the ground that it ought to have denied generally that the plaintiff had in any manner set over or parted with the indenture of lease, instead of confining the issue to the mode of parting with it alleged in the plea. The defendant demurred also to the replication to the last plea, on the ground that the plea did not deny or attempt to raise any issue upon the sowing of beans by the plaintiff; whereas the plaintiff by the replication sought to involve that question in issue; also that the replication did not shew that the potatoes and peas said to have been planted were twice, or in any manner hoed. After the case had been argued, it stood over, that the parties might consider whether they would amend; but as neither party has thought fit to do so, we must pronounce our judgment on the demurrer in its present state; and we are of opinion on the demurrer to the replication to the eighth plea, that the defendant must succeed. It is a general rule of pleading, that a traverse more large than necessary is bad (Comyn's Digest, Pleader, G, 15), where, as instances of traverses, may be mentioned a case cited from Yelverton:—"Traverse of the surrender of a copyhold to such a steward such a day is bad; for the day and steward ought not to be part of the issue, but the traverse ought to be of the surrender modo et formâ." And again: "So in trover, if the plaintiff alleges conversion by the sale of the goods, traverse of the conversion by sale is too large." The case of Stubbs v. Lainson (1 M. & W. 728) was decided on the same principle. Several other cases are cited from Mr. Stephen's work on Pleading (5th edit. 281), where the rule is clearly laid down and explained; and in the next page he states and explains the rule upon which the argument in support of this replication is based, namely, that a party may in general traverse a material allegation of title or estate to the extent to which it is alleged. It appears to us, however, that the allegation under the videlicet, that the indenture of lease was parted with by mortgaging to Watson and Broughton, was not a material allegation of title, and that the plaintiff could not properly put it in issue by a traverse. In deciding upon the replication to the last plea, it is necessary to mention what the plea therein alleged. The covenant set out is twofold; that the tenant will not take more than two crops of grain in succession, and will do certain other things. The plea then avers correctly a breach of the first branch of the covenant, but does not shew a breach of the second: it does not state the tenant did not sow with beans, but that he did not sow with peas, which was the mode in which he was alleged to have committed the breach of the second branch of the covenant. The replication contains a traverse of the breach, well alleged, in a mode which would not have been a sufficient answer to the plea as to the breach of the second branch of the covenant, if it had been shewn. But we are of opinion the averments in the plea following the good breach are merely surplusage, for they do not amount to a defective statement of the breach of the second branch of the covenant which is stated, and sufficiently stated, but that which is necessary to shew the second branch of the covenant is broken, is not stated at all. The replication, therefore, which answers the only material part of the last plea, is good, notwithstanding the introduction of immaterial matter, and is an answer to the material matter contained in the plea. The judgment of the Court, therefore, must be for the defendant on the demurrer to the replication to the eighth plea, and for the plaintiff on the demurrer to the replication to the last plea. Judgment accordingly.

THE LEGISLATOR.

Summary.

SUBJOINED are some interesting Parliamentary Papers and Returns. As much of the legislation of last session as our columns this number will admit is here presented.

At the Court at Osborne-house, Isle of Wight, the 13th day of September, 1845, present, the Queen's most excellent Majesty in Council.—It is this day ordered by her Majesty in Council, that the Parliament, which stands prorogued to Thursday, the 2nd day of October next, be further prorogued to Thursday, the 27th day of November next.

Crown-Office, Sept. 16.—Member returned to serve in this present Parliament. Borough of Southwark.—Sir William Molesworth, Bart., of No. 1, Lowndes-square, in the county of Middlesex, and of Pencarrow, in the county of Cornwall, in the room of Benjamin Wood, esq. deceased.

Revision of the Lists of Voters.—Monday week, the 15th inst. (the first day allowed) has been appointed for the commencement of the revision of the lists of voters in the cities and boroughs of England and Wales. The revision must be concluded before the end of October. The barristers are now paid by salaries of 210*l.* each, which amounts to 14,700*l.* a year, instead of so much per day and their travelling expenses. The expense of the first revision, after the passing of the Reform Act, exceeded 30,000*l.* Last year several revisions were finished in one day, and the longest period occupied was 39 days. There were only seven appeals from counties last year, of which two were decided in favour of the appellants, and five for the respondents. There were 23 appeals from cities and boroughs, of which number 17 of the decisions were for the respondents (some with costs), and 5 for the appellants. One appeal was dismissed. The Court of Common Pleas awarded costs for the first time last year to several cities and boroughs, as respondents. The whole costs awarded amounted to about 100*l.* The city of London, in a case where no one appeared to support the appeal, was ordered to be paid 16*l.* and in a similar case the borough of Lambeth was decreed 13*l.* 1s. 9d.

The late Mr. E. B. Clive, M.P.—The will of the late Mr. Edward Bolton Clive, of Whitfield, in the county of Hereford, has been proved by his son, the Rev. Archer Clive, clerk, the sole executor. He bequeaths to his son, Mr. George Clive, 20,000*l.* in addition to any sum that may be payable to him out of his estates; bequeaths to his daughter, Mrs. Wetherell, an annuity of 600*l.* a year, to be paid out of his estates in England; leaves liberal legacies to his servants; and bequeathes all the residue of his real and personal estates to his eldest surviving son, the Rev. Archer Clive. He desired by his will that he might be buried in the family vault at Wormbridge, without parade, and like any private gentleman. The will is dated the 24th of April, 1845, and his death occurred on the 22nd of July.—Morning Post.

SOUTH AUSTRALIA.—A Parliamentary paper was issued on Saturday, containing copies of the correspondence on the subject of the colonial land fund of South Australia. There are fifteen letters and despatches in the correspondence. Several holders of special surveys in South Australia complained, in August 1844, to Lord Stanley, as Colonial Secretary, that they had purchased land under the 4 & 5 Wm. 4, c. 95, on the faith that the whole of the purchase-money would be applied to the giving a free passage to labouring emigrants, which promise the Government had not fulfilled. The reply was to the effect that South Australia having become insolvent, the resources of that settlement did not supply any means of sending out emigrants in respect of the previous purchases of land, and that no vote was taken of British funds for the purpose. The memorialists again urged their claims on Lord Stanley, remarking that, however, as individuals, they regretted the insolvency of the colony, their money was paid under the guarantee of an Act of Parliament; and trusted that his lordship would bring their claims before Parliament. Lord Stanley, by his secretary (Mr. Hope, M.P.), repudiated the construction put on the Act, and refused to make any application to Parliament. The holders again addressed his lordship in January last, which called forth a reply without relief. In February another letter was sent by the holders of special surveys, in which the following passage appears:—"We beg to assure your lordship we feel most honoured and fortified in the justice of our claims by the consideration that at one time you regarded them favourably; and we trust we may be excused expressing our ignorance of aught which may have occurred since to alter your views. Our patient endurance of delay, and our urging our claims at a period when the fulfilment of them would be most beneficial to all parties, we trust give us an increased demand for a favourable consideration." His lordship merely referred, in answer, to his former letter. It seems that during the time the correspondence was pending Governor Grey recommended an advance of 2,000*l.* for the purposes of emigration, in consequence of the purchase of waste land, and by the concluding document in the correspondence, bearing date the 7th of July last, Lord Stanley stated that, under all the circumstances, and adverting to the satisfactory progress of the land fund, the advance of the 2,000*l.* would be made for the purposes of emigration.

AGENTS FOR COLONIES.—A parliamentary document has just been published containing the names, salaries, and duties of agents for the colonies acting in Great Britain, &c. There are 33 colonies mentioned in the return, of which Mr. George Baillie, Joint Agent-General for Crown colonies, has 12 allotted to him, and Mr. E. Barnard, Joint Agent-General, has 10 assigned to him. They were appointed, in 1838, by the Secretary of State for the Colonies, at a salary of 800*l.* a year, and a joint allowance of 500*l.* a year for office, rent, &c. They are paid out of the colonial funds, and act in England generally for the colonies. Mr. W. Burge is the agent for Jamaica, appointed under the Colonial Act of 1830 by the Legislature of Jamaica, by whom he is paid 1,000*l.* a year to attend to the interests of the colony. Mr. J. P. Mayers is agent for Barbadoes, appointed by the Colonial Act of 1829 by the Legislature of Barbadoes, at a salary of 500*l.* a year, paid by the colony. Mr. J. Colquhoun is agent for six colonies, for three of which he acts gratuitously, and for the others he is paid 200*l.* a year and contingent expenses, and 100*l.* each for two others. Mr. E. L. Nugent is agent for Antigua, appointed by the Assembly at 400*l.* a year, with 30*l.* for expenses. Mr. P. M. Stewart, M.P. is agent for Tobago, appointed by the act of the Legislature and the Crown. The agent was paid 150*l.* a year from 1832 to 1838, when the salary was given up. Mr. J. Marryat is agent for Grenada, without salary, appointed by a colonial Act in 1831. The duties of the agents, with the exception of those appointed by the Colonial Secretary, are defined by Acts of Parliament. Mr. Trelawny, the member for Tavistock, obtained the return.

(August 4, 1845.)

1. Whereas an Act was passed in the fourth year of the reign of her present Majesty, intituled "An Act for facilitating the Administration of Justice in the Court of Chancery," whereby power was given to the Lord Chancellor, with the advice and consent of the Master of the Rolls and the Vice-Chancellor, or one of them, to make, from time to time, and at any time within five years from the passing of the said Act, any rules, orders, and regulations for the purposes of the said Act mentioned; and it was thereby enacted, that all such rules, orders, and regulations should be laid before both Houses of Parliament, if Parliament should be then sitting, immediately upon the making or issuing of the same, or if Parliament should not then be sitting, then within five days after the next meeting thereof: and whereas another Act was passed in the fifth year of the reign of her present Majesty, whereby it was enacted, that every such rule, order, or regulation made in pursuance of the said recited Act should, from and after the time in that behalf to be appointed by the Lord Chancellor, with such advice and consent as aforesaid, and if no time should be so appointed, then from and after the making thereof, be binding and obligatory on the said Court, and be of like force and effect as if the provisions therein contained had been expressly enacted by Parliament; and it was thereby provided, that if either of the Houses of Parliament should, by any resolution passed at any time before such House of Parliament should have actually sat thirty-six days after such rules, orders, and regulations should have been laid before such House of Parliament, resolve that the whole or any part of such rules, orders, or regulations ought not to continue in force, in such case the whole, or such part thereof as should be so included in such resolution, should, from and after such resolution, cease to be binding and obligatory on the said Court; and it was thereby also provided, that no such rule, order, or regulation as aforesaid should, by virtue of the said Act, be of the like force and effect as if the provisions therein contained had been expressly made by Parliament, unless the same should be expressed to be made in pursuance of the said Act, and of the now-reciting Act; and that every such rule, order, or regulation so expressed to be made in pursuance of the said Act, and of the now-reciting Act, which should not be laid before both houses of Parliament within the time by the said recited Act limited for that purpose, should, from and after the expiration of such time, be absolutely void and of no effect: and whereas an Act was passed in the fifth year of the reign of her present Majesty, intituled "An Act to make further Provision for the Administration of Justice," under the authority of which two additional Vice-Chancellors have been appointed; and it was thereby enacted, that from and after the appointment of the Vice-Chancellors, under the said now-reciting Act, it should be lawful for the Lord Chancellor, with the advice and consent of the Master of the Rolls and Vice-Chancellors for the time being, or any two of them, and he was thereby authorized and empowered, to do all such acts, and to make and issue all such rules and orders, as by any Act or Acts of Parliament then in force the Lord Chancellor, with the advice or consent of the Master of the Rolls and the Vice-Chancellor for the time being, or one of them, was empowered to do, make, or issue: and whereas rules, orders, or regulations have from time to time been made in pursuance of the said two first-recited Acts, but it is expedient to extend the time limited by the said first-recited Act for the making thereof in manner hereinafter mentioned: be it therefore enacted, by the Queen's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, That the term of five years, which, under and by virtue of the said first-recited Act, now stands limited as the time within which any rules, orders, or regulations thereby, or by the said two other Acts, authorized and required to be made, must be so made, shall be and the same is hereby extended to ten years from the passing of the said first-recited Act, as if such term of ten years had been originally contained in that Act.

2. That all rules, orders, and regulations made, and to be hereafter made under the provisions of the said recited Acts and this Act, or any of them, shall for all purposes be deemed and taken to be general rules and orders of the High Court of Chancery.

3. And whereas by another Act passed in the fourth year of the reign of his late Majesty King William the Fourth, intituled "An Act for the Regulation of the Proceedings and Practice of certain Offices of the High Court of Chancery in England," it was enacted, that from and after the death, resignation, or removal from his office of the present patentee of the Subpœna Office all the duties of such office should be performed by the clerk of the affidavits, who should thereupon receive and account for, in manner thereinafter mentioned, all the fees then receivable by the said patentee: and whereas since the passing of the last-mentioned Act four clerks of records and writs have been appointed, by whom the business of issuing writs on the equity side of the Court of Chancery, other than such writs as are issuable by the patentee of the Subpœna Office, is now discharged: and whereas it is expedient that the duties of the patentee of the Subpœna Office, should be performed and the fees payable to him should be received by the said clerks of records and writs; be it therefore enacted, That so much of the said Act of the fourth year of the reign of his said late Majesty as provides for the execution of the duties and the receipt of the fees of the Subpœna Office by the clerk of the affidavits shall be and the same is hereby repealed; and that after the death, resignation, or removal from his office of the present patentee of the Subpœna Office the said clerks of records and writs, or any one of them, shall, in place and instead of the said clerk of the affidavits, perform all the duties of the Subpœna Office, and shall receive all the fees now receivable by the said patentee of that office, and shall pay such parts thereof as the said patentee is now by the said last-mentioned Act required to pay to the several officers named in that Act for that purpose, and shall pay the residue of such fees into the Bank of England, to be placed to the account there standing in the name of the Accountant-General of the High Court of Chancery, intituled "The Suitors' Fee Fund Account," at such times and under such regulations as the Lord Chancellor, with the advice and consent of the Master of the Rolls and the Vice-Chancellors for the time being, or any two of them, shall by any order direct: provided always, that it shall be lawful for the Lord Chancellor, with such advice and consent as last aforesaid, by any rule or order to be made under the provisions of the said two first-recited Acts, to fix such earlier time for transferring the execution of the duties of the Subpœna Office to the clerks of records and writs as he shall think fit.

4. That this Act may be amended or repealed in the present session of Parliament.

Cap. CVI.

This statute will be found verbatim at page 434 of the present volume, its great importance making it necessary to print it out of its proper place. Thither we refer the reader.

Cap. CVII.

An Act for the Establishment of a Central Asylum for Persons charged with Offences in Ireland; and to amend an Act relating to the prevention of Offences by Insane Persons, and the Acts respecting Asylums for the Insane Poor in Ireland; and for appropriating the Lunatic Asylum in the City of Cork for the purposes of a District Lunatic Asylum (August 8, 1845.)

Cap. CVIII.

An Act for the further Amendment of an Act of the sixth year of her present Majesty, for regulating the Irish Fisheries. (August 8, 1845.)

CAP. CIX.

An Act to amend the Law concerning Games and Wagers. (August 8, 1845.)

Sec. 1 repeals part of 33 Hen. 8, c. 9.

Sec. 2 determines what shall be sufficient evidence that a house is a common gaming-house.

3. That in every case (except within the metropolitan police district) in which the justices of peace in every shire, and mayors, sheriffs, bailiffs, and other head officers within every city, town, and borough, within this realm, now have by law authority to enter into any house, room, or place where unlawful games shall be suspected to be holden, it shall be lawful for any justice of the peace, upon complaint made before him on oath that there is reason to suspect any house, room, or place to be kept or used as a common gaming-house, to give authority, by special warrant under his hand, when in his discretion he shall think fit, to any constable, to enter, with such assistance as may be found necessary, into such house, room, or place, in like manner as might have been done by such justices, mayors, sheriffs, bailiffs, or other head officers, and, if necessary, to use force for making such entry, whether by breaking open doors or otherwise, and to arrest, search, and bring before a justice of peace all such persons found therein as might have been arrested therein by such justice of peace had he been personally present; and all such persons shall be dealt with according to law, as if they had been arrested in such house, room, or place by the justice before whom they shall be so brought; and any such warrant may be in the form given in the first schedule annexed to this Act.

4. That the owner or keeper of any common gaming-house, and every person having the care or management thereof, and also every banker, croupier, and other person who shall act in any manner in conducting the business of any common gaming-house, shall, on conviction thereof, by his own confession, or by the oath of one or more credible witnesses, before any two justices of the peace, beside any penalty or punishment to which he may be liable under the provisions of the said Act of King Henry the Eighth, be liable to forfeit and pay such penalty, not more than one hundred pounds, as shall be adjudged by the justices before whom he shall be convicted, or, in the discretion of the justices before whom he shall be convicted, may be committed to the house of correction, with or without hard labour, for any time not more than six calendar months; and on nonpayment of any penalty so adjudged, and of the reasonable costs and charges attending the conviction, the same shall be levied by distress and sale of the goods and chattels of the offender, by warrant under the hand and seal of one of the convicting justices: provided always, that nothing herein contained shall prevent any proceeding by indictment against the owner or keeper or other person having the care or management of a common gaming-house; but no person who shall have been summarily convicted of any such offence shall be liable to be proceeded against by indictment for the same offence.

Sec. 5 enacts, that proof of gaming for money, &c. is not necessary in support of informations for gaming.

Sec. 6. Commissioners of police may authorize superintendent and constables to enter gaming houses and seize all instruments of gaming, and take into custody all persons found therein.

Sec. 7. Police superintendent may search for instruments of gaming.

8. That where any cards, dice, balls, counters, tables, or other instruments of gaming used in playing any unlawful game, shall be found in any house, room, or place suspected to be used as a common gaming house, and entered under a warrant or order issued under the provisions of this Act, or about the person of any of those who shall be found therein, it shall be evidence, until the contrary be made to appear, that such house, room, or place is used as a common gaming house, and that the persons found in the room or place where such tables or instruments of gaming shall have been found were playing therein, although no play was actually going on in the presence of the superintendent or constable entering the same, under a warrant or order issued under the provisions of this Act, or in the presence of those persons by whom he shall be accompanied as aforesaid; and it shall be lawful for the police magistrate or justices before whom any person shall be taken by virtue of the warrant or order to direct all such tables and instruments of gaming to be forthwith destroyed.

9. And for the more effectual prosecution of the keepers of common gaming houses, be it enacted, that every person who shall have been concerned in any unlawful gaming, and who shall be examined as a witness by or before any police magistrate or justice of the peace, or on the trial of any indictment or information against the owner or keeper or other person having the care or management of any common gaming house, touching such unlawful gaming, and who upon such examination shall make true and faithful discovery to the best of his or her knowledge of all things as to which he or she shall not be so examined, and shall thereupon receive from the magistrate or justice of the peace or judge of the court by or before whom he or she shall be so examined, a certificate in writing to that effect, shall be freed from all criminal prosecutions, and from all forfeitures, punishments, and disabilities, to which he or she may have become liable for any thing done before that time in respect of such unlawful gaming.

10. That the justices in every division, district, and place in England for which a special session of the justices of the peace (called the General Annual Licensing Meeting) is holden annually for granting licenses to persons keeping or being about to keep inns, alehouses, and victualling houses to sell exciseable liquors by retail, to be drunk or consumed on the premises therein specified, shall have authority at such general annual licensing meeting, or at any adjournment thereof, to grant billiard licenses to such persons as the said justices shall in their discretion deem fit and proper to keep public billiard tables and bagatelle boards, or instruments used in any game of the like kind, and at the special sessions holden for transferring licenses to keep inns shall have authority to transfer such billiard licenses to such other persons as they in their discretion shall deem fit and proper to continue to hold the same, and who in each case shall be required to give the like notice of their intention to apply for such billiard license, and entitled to receive the like notice of the licensing days as is required in the case of persons intending to apply for a license or the transfer of a license to sell exciseable liquors by retail to be drunk or consumed on the premises, or as near thereto as the case will allow; and every such billiard license shall be in the form given in the third schedule annexed to this Act, and shall continue in force in the counties of Middlesex and Surrey from the fifth day of April, and elsewhere from the tenth day of October, after the granting thereof, for one whole year thence respectively next ensuing, and no longer; and the clerk of the justices shall be entitled to demand and receive from every person licensed under this Act, for the petty constable or other peace officer, for serving notices and other services required of him, the sum of one shilling, and for the clerk of the justices, for the license, the sum of five shillings; and every clerk who shall demand or receive from any person for such fees more than the said sums, being together six shillings, shall for every such offence, on conviction before one justice, forfeit and pay the sum of five pounds.

11. That after the fifth day of April, one thousand eight hundred and forty-six, in the counties of Middlesex and Surrey, and elsewhere after the tenth day of October next after the passing of this Act, every house, room, or place kept for public billiard playing, or where a public billiard table or bagatelle board, or instrument used in any game of the like kind, is kept, at which persons are admitted to play, except in houses or premises specified in any license granted under an Act passed in the ninth year of the reign of king George the Fourth, intituled "An Act to regulate the granting of Licenses to Keepers of Inns, Alehouses, and Victualling Houses in England," hereinafter called a victualler's licence, shall be licensed under this Act; and after the said fifth day of April in Middlesex and Surrey, and elsewhere after the said tenth day of October, every person keeping any such public billiard table or bagatelle board, or instrument used in any game of the like kind for public use, without being duly licensed so to do, and not holding a victualler's license for the house or premises where such billiard table, bagatelle board, or other instrument as aforesaid is kept or used, and also every person licensed under this Act who shall not during the continuance of such billiard license put and keep up the words "licensed for billiards," legibly printed in some conspicuous place near the door and on the outside of the house specified in the license, shall be liable to be proceeded against as the keeper of a common gaming house, and, beside any penalty or punishment to which he may be liable if convicted of keeping a common gaming house, shall, on conviction of keeping such unlicensed billiard table, bagatelle board, or other instrument as aforesaid, by his own confession, or by the oath of one or more credible witnesses before any police magistrate or any two justices of the peace, be liable to pay such penalty, not more than ten pounds, for every day on which such billiard table, bagatelle board, or instrument as aforesaid shall be used, as shall be adjudged by the magistrate or justices before whom he shall be convicted, or, in the discretion of the magistrate or justices, may be committed to the house of correction with or without hard labour, for any time not more than one calendar month; and on nonpayment of any penalty so adjudged, and of the reasonable costs and charges of the conviction, the same shall be levied by distress and sale of the goods and chattels of the offender, by warrant under the hand and seal of the magistrate or one of the convicting justices; but no person who shall have been summarily convicted of any such offence shall be liable to be further proceeded against by indictment for the same offence.

Sec. 12. Penalties for offences against tenor of licenses.

Sec. 13. When billiard playing shall not be allowed.

Sec. 14. Empowering constables to visit licensed houses.

Sec. 15. Repeal of 16 C. 2, c. 7; 10 W. 3 (I.); 9 Anne, c. 14; 11 Anne (I.); 5 & 6 Wm. 4, c. 41; and part of 18 G. 2, c. 34.

Sec. 16. Pending actions and informations to be discontinued.

Sec. 17. Cheating at play to be punished as obtaining money by false pretences.

18. That all contracts or agreements, whether by parole or in writing, by way of gaming or wagering, shall be null and void; and that no suit shall be brought or maintained in any court of law or equity for recovering any sum of money or valuable thing alleged to be won upon any wager, or which shall have been deposited in the hands of any person to abide the event on which any wager shall have been made: provided always that this enactment shall not be deemed to apply to any subscription or contribution, or agreement to subscribe or contribute, for or toward any plate, prize, or sum of money to be awarded to the winner or winners of any lawful game, sport, pastime, or exercise.

19. And whereas many important questions are now tried in the form of feigned issues, by stating that a wager was laid between two parties interested in respectively maintaining the affirmative and the negative of certain propositions; but such questions may be as satisfactorily tried without such form; be it therefore enacted, That in every case where any court of law or equity may desire to have any question of fact decided by a jury, it shall be lawful for such Court to direct a writ of summons to be sued out, by such person or persons as such Court shall think ought to be plaintiff or plaintiffs, against such person or persons as such Court shall think ought to be defendant or defendants thereto, in the form set forth in the second schedule to this Act annexed, with such is now practised in proceedings under a feigned issue.

20. 21. That when any distress shall be made for any money to be levied by virtue of the warrant of any justice under this Act, the distress shall not be deemed unlawful, nor shall any party making the same be deemed a trespasser, on account of any defect or want of form in the information, summons, warrant of apprehension, conviction, warrant of distress, or other proceeding relating thereto, nor shall such party be deemed a trespasser from the beginning on account of any irregularity which shall be afterwards committed by him, but all persons aggrieved by such defect or irregularity may recover full satisfaction for the special damage by an action on the case in any of her Majesty's courts of record.

Sec. 22. Plaintiff not to recover after tender of amends.

Sec. 23. Limitation of actions within three calendar months.

Sec. 24. Construction of terms.

Sec. 24. Conviction, &c. not to be quashed for informality, &c.

An Act to Amend the Laws relating to the Assessing of County Rates. (August 8, 1845.)

1. Whereas it is expedient to amend the Laws in being relating to the assessing of county rates: be it therefore enacted by the Queen's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, That from and after the passing of this Act it shall be lawful for her Majesty's justices of the peace of every county in England, assembled at their general or quarter sessions of the peace, or at any adjournment thereof, from time to time, as often as they may deem it necessary, to appoint any number of justices, not exceeding eleven in number nor less than five, to be a committee for the purpose of preparing fair and equal county rates, or of altering and amending such rates, from time to time, as circumstances may require.

2. And be it enacted, That the committee so appointed shall hold their first meeting after their appointment at such time and place as shall be fixed by the said Court of Quarter Sessions, and their subsequent meetings at such times and places as they shall themselves appoint for carrying this Act into execution; and at every meeting of the said committee, if three or more members thereof are present, they shall be competent to act as fully and effectually as if all the members of the said committee were present.

Sec. 3. Committee may appoint a clerk.

4. That for the purpose of preparing such fair and equal county rates the said committee, by their order in writing, to be signed by their clerk, may, from time to time, as often as they may deem it necessary, direct the overseers of the poor, constables, assessors, and collectors of public rates of or for any parish, township, or place within the county, and all other persons having the custody or management of any public or parochial rates or valuations of any such parish, township, or place, to make returns in writing to the said committee, at such times and places as they may appoint, of the amount of the full and fair annual value of the whole or of any part of the property within the parish, township, or place liable to be assessed toward the county rate, together with the date of the last valuation for the assessment of such parish, and the name of the surveyor by whom the valuation was made; and the overseers of the poor required to make any such return in respect of any parish, township, or place maintaining its own poor, and the constable or other person required to make any such return in respect of any place not maintaining its own poor, shall, before they present the same to the said committee, lay the same before a vestry meeting of the parish, township, or place for which they act, or where no vestry meeting is held, before some other meeting of the inhabitants of such place, if any such there be, at which the public business of such place is commonly transacted.

5. That the property liable to be assessed towards the county rate shall be taken to be the property which in any parish or place maintaining its own poor is liable to be rated to the relief of the poor, or which in any place not maintaining its poor would be liable to be rated for the relief of the poor if such place were a parish.

6. That for the purposes of assessing any county rate the words "full and fair annual value" shall be taken to mean the net annual value of any property as the same is or may be required by law to be estimated for the purpose of assessing the rates for the relief of the poor.

Sec. 7. Committees empowered to inspect rates, assessments, valuations, &c.

8. That every overseer of the poor, constable, assessor, collector, or other person so required to make returns, or to appear as aforesaid, who shall, without any reasonable excuse, neglect to make such returns in writing as aforesaid, or wilfully make any false return, and every person who shall neglect or refuse to appear when required so to do as aforesaid, or to be sworn or examined, or to produce such documents as hereinbefore provided, shall forfeit a sum not exceeding twenty pounds, to be prosecuted and recovered by order of the said committee before any two of her Majesty's justices of the peace.

Sec. 9. Committees may cause new valuations to be made.

Sec. 10. Allowances and compensation to persons employed in the execution of this Act.

Sec. 11. If parish officers neglect or make false returns, expenses of valuations to be paid by parishes.

Sec. 14. Notice to be given when rate will be taken into consideration by Court of General Quarter Sessions.

Sec. 15. Rate to be deemed valid after confirmation by Court of General or Quarter Sessions.

16. That if at any time after the said rate has been made as aforesaid any overseer or overseers of the poor, constable, or other person charged with the collection and levy of county rate in any parish or place, or other inhabitant or inhabitants thereof, have reason to think that such parish, township, or place is aggrieved by any such rate, whether it be on account of some one or more of them being without sufficient cause omitted altogether from the rate, or on account of such parish, township, or place being rated on a sum beyond the full and fair annual value of the property therein liable to be assessed toward the county rate, or on account of some other parish, or parishes, township or townships, place or places, being rated on a sum less than the full and fair annual value of the property therein liable to be assessed toward the county rate, such overseer or overseers of the poor, constable, or other person, or inhabitant or inhabitants, may appeal to the justices of the peace for the county, at the general or quarter session to be holden next after the session at which such rate was allowed and confirmed, against such part of the rate only as may affect the parish or parishes, township or townships, place or places which appear to be over-rated or under-rated, or omitted altogether from the rate as aforesaid (subject to the provisions hereinafter contained); and if in any case where any overseer or overseers, constable, or other person as aforesaid, of one parish or place, appeals against the rate on any other parish or place, on account of the same being altogether omitted from such rate, or on account of the same being rated at less than the full and fair annual value thereof as aforesaid, such overseer or overseers, constable, or other person shall give twenty-one days' previous notice in writing of the intention to appeal, and of the cause and matter thereof, to the overseers of the poor, or where there are no such overseers, to the constable or other person charged with the collection and levy of county rate in such other parish or place; and if in any case where any such overseer or overseers, constable, or other person appeal against the rate on the ground that any parish, township, or place is rated on a sum beyond the full and fair annual value of the rateable property therein, such overseer or overseers, constable, or other person shall give twenty-one days' notice thereof in writing, with the cause and matter thereof, to the clerk of the peace of the county, the said justices shall be empowered to hear and determine such appeal in manner by this Act directed, and either to confirm such parts of the rate as have been appealed against, or to correct such inequalities or omissions as shall be proved to exist therein, in such manner as to them the said justices may appear fair, just, and equitable; but no such rate shall upon any appeal be quashed or destroyed, in regard to any other parish, township, or place, unless in cases where the justices of the peace in general or quarter session assembled, or the major part of them, deem it necessary to proceed to the making of an entire new rate, and when they proceed therein according to the provisions of this Act.

17. That it shall be lawful for the Court of General or Quarter Session of the Peace, upon any such appeal, instead of hearing the said appeal, to order, upon the application of the appellant or respondent in such appeal, a survey and valuation of their respective parishes, townships, or places, and shall fix the next or some subsequent session for receiving such survey and valuation, and for hearing and determining the said appeal, and such Court shall also thereupon appoint a proper person or persons to make such survey and valuation; and the person or persons so appointed shall for that purpose have full power, with or without assistants, to enter upon, view, and examine, survey, measure, and value, all and any lands, houses, and property liable to be assessed toward the county rate within the parishes, townships, and places mentioned in such order; and such survey and valuation shall be reported to the general or quarter session fixed as aforesaid for receiving the same; and the Court then and there assembled shall hear and determine the said appeal in the manner hereinbefore set forth.

Sec. 18. Penalty on persons obstructing overseers, &c.

Sec. 19. Penalties and forfeitures, costs and charges, may be levied by distress and sale of offender's goods.

Sec. 20. Sessions to determine costs of appeal and of valuation ordered by sessions.

Sec. 21. Costs of valuations directed by committee.

22. That all the powers, authorities, provisions, clauses, and regulations contained in any former Act or Acts relating to the assessment, collection, and levying of county rates (save and except such parts thereof respectively as are hereby varied, altered, or repealed) shall be good, valid, and effectual for the purposes of assessing, levying, collecting, and enforcing the payment of the rate or rates hereafter to be made in pursuance of this Act, and for carrying this Act into execution.

Sec. 23. County rate shall not be assessed otherwise than as directed by 5 & 6 Wm. 4, c. 76.

Sec. 24. The Act extended to all places having separate commission of the peace, and to all rates of the nature of county rates.

25. That this Act may be amended or repealed by any Act to be passed in this session of Parliament.

FRANCE AND ENGLAND.—The Siècle has a long article on the state of crime in England and France, as shewn by the returns of the two countries. The writer says that the increase of crimes and offences in Great Britain was, between the years 1835 and 1842, when it was more remarkable than at any other period, 50 per cent.; but comparing the number of accused in 1844 with that in 1835, he finds the increase to be 26 per cent. This is certainly a sad state of things, and we are not surprised that our contemporary should attribute it in a great measure to the influence of poverty in the masses of the labouring population: but in speaking of the increase of crime, that of population should not be overlooked. The latter did not reach 26 per cent. in the period alluded to, but we believe it was nearly equal to half that amount. The writer observes that in England in 1840 the female offenders amount to 23 7-100 of the total number, and adds that such is the proportion at the present time. The English writers on statistics, says he, conclude that females who have once erred are not so easily brought back to honest habits as men; but, according to him, this is not the case in France. It is the case in all countries, he adds, where habit rather than principle is the basis of probity. This is not very clearly expressed. As far as education goes, there ought to be more principle in the females of England than in those of this country, for education is more general there than it is here. But we are not prepared to declare that education in England amongst the lower classes is what it ought to be. They are indeed taught religion and morality at an early age, but the mode of teaching is not such as to leave any very lasting impression. One of the great evils in the education of the lower classes in England is the low rate at which the teachers are paid. It cannot be expected that men who are paid for this duty at a lower rate than daily labourers can be well fitted for the occupation. They may be able to teach according to certain rules laid down for national schools, but for the cultivation of mind it is necessary that there should be mind of a superior calibre in those who teach; and this, as a general rule, is far from being the case. We have, for instance, seen in a Manchester paper an advertisement from the directors and guardians of a parochial workhouse, requiring a light porter and a schoolmaster, the former with 20*l.* a year and his board, and the latter 10*l.*; and we fear this is but too common an estimate of the respective value of body and mind. It is hardly to be expected that the education of the poor in England should be a good one when teachers are remunerated on such a scale; for what man fitted for the task of tuition would accept an office to which such a mark of degradation is attached? The real cause of the greater proportion of crime in the English women of the labouring class, as compared with the same class in France, arises, we have no doubt, from habits of sobriety of the French women. This habit, not principle. Girls at school in France are not cautioned against drunkenness; it is unnecessary, for the habits of those with whom they will have to associate when they are women are sober, and corruption in this respect is not feared. In concluding his article, the writer of the Siècle says:—"England, with a population which is equal to half that of France, has each year 90,000 persons accused of crime, whereas we have only 60,000. If comparisons of this nature had a scientific rigour, I should say that for one crime committed in France, three are committed in England; but I prefer, in so grave a question, the view of humanity to that of national feeling. The sores of our neighbours do not console one for the wounds of civilization." We approve of the sentiment here expressed; but we think the writer has greatly exaggerated the proportion of crime in the two states.—Galignani's Messenger.

The following building has been duly registered for the solemnisation of marriages, pursuant to the Act of the 6 & 7 Wm. 4, c. 85:—The Wesleyan Chapel, situated in Stafford-street, at Longton, in the parish of Stoke-upon-Trent, in the county of Stafford, in the district of Stoke-upon-Trent.

THE LAWYER.

Summary.

WE invite attention to an article extracted from the Manchester Guardian, on the question of the legality of the sale of railway shares in companies that are but provisionally, and others that are completely registered. It may be found under the head "Journal of Property." From this it will be seen that the Attorney-General and other counsel, to whom the case had been submitted, are unanimously of opinion that sales of letters of allotment in railway companies established since 1st November last, after provisional, but before complete registration of the company, are illegal; but that sales of scrip after complete registration, and before an Act of Parliament is obtained, are clearly legal. The opinions given are of double value just now, since they materially tend to remove the doubts in which the question was involved. Another of "The Leading Cases," which have elicited from many of our subscribers, spontaneously, the highest approval, is given below.

CRIMINAL LAW.

THE EIGHTH REPORT OF HER MAJESTY'S COMMISSIONERS ON CRIMINAL LAW.

This Report, issued on 5th July last, is of such extreme value, both for its strictures on the laws as existing at present and the suggestions it throws out for their improvement, that we propose to give it at full length; and we are the more disposed to do this seeing that the paragraphs are, for the most part, so succinct and compressed that without injury they will not admit of abridgment.

To the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty, in her High Court of Chancery.

We, your Majesty's Commissioners, appointed by your Majesty's Commission, bearing date the 22nd day of February, in the eighth year of your Majesty's reign, having, in obedience to your Majesty's Commission, completed our Digest of the Law of Procedure in respect of Indictable Offences, with a Report thereon, do humbly submit the same to your Majesty. We have distributed the subject into chapters, which are subdivided into sections and articles, in conformity with our Digest of Crimes and Punishments; and we have, in performing this branch of our duty, adopted nearly the same course which we observed in relation to crimes and punishments; we have referred to the principal authorities upon which we have relied, and have stated our reasons for what we have done in all cases where the authorities have been liable to doubt, or where it has appeared to us expedient that any alteration should be adopted which we deemed ourselves competent to make of our own authority. It is proper, however, to observe, that we have made some deviation from our former course, in having frequently stated our reasons for the alterations which we have deemed it expedient to make, as well as our suggestions in respect of proposed alterations, in the notes to the proper articles of the Digest, instead of specifying them in detail in the body of the Report; and that in order to execute our duty as nearly as might be within the limit prescribed to us, we have, in many instances, adhered strictly to the rules of the existing law, in preference to the preparing and suggesting of new ones. Although many alterations might, we think, be made with advantage, they are frequently of such a nature as to involve the preparation of a number of new rules, the substitution of which for those at present existing would, if the reasons for alteration were to be disapproved, be so much useless labour. Such observations are particularly applicable to the suggestions made, with a view to substitute a more simple and compendious process of outlawry.

The question has necessarily occurred, to what extent the law of procedure should detail the praxis of each criminal court. It has appeared to us that the Digest should not enter into such particularities, but deal only with the more general provisions, leaving the minute details of practice to be provided for by their own peculiar rules, to be sanctioned and approved of in the mode prescribed by the Legislature. To pursue a contrary course would be attended with much difficulty and inconvenience. Many of the merely practical rules, especially those of the inferior courts, are unsettled and imperfect; and were it otherwise, the adding to the Digest several distinct appendages containing the minutiæ of practice belonging to each of such courts would enlarge it to an inconvenient extent. Another obstacle presents itself, particularly as regards the practice of the Court of Queen's Bench. By virtue of the Act of the sixth year of your Majesty's reign, intituled "An Act for Abolishing certain Offices on the Crown side of the Court of Queen's Bench, and for regulating the Crown Office," many excellent rules have been framed.(a) If these were to be embodied in the Digest, and made permanent by the Legislature, the spirit of this statute would be defeated, which leaves to the Court itself the framing its own rules of practice. This we think would be highly disadvantageous, deeming the principle to be a good one that such a Court is best able to ascertain what rules of this kind will best answer the ends of justice. The same principle applies to the practice of inferior courts, subject to the condition that their rules should be sanctioned by the superintendence and authority of some higher court.

Although we have, as a general rule, abstained from entering upon the discussion of suggested alterations in the body of our Report, our observations on the subject of criminal pleading constitute an exception, which rests on peculiar grounds.

The adoption of a digest of defined crimes is so intimately connected with the rules of criminal pleading, as to render the consideration of the latter highly expedient; those rules are, in truth, when connected with such a digest, much more capable of a simple, concise, and systematic form than they could possibly be were the law to be left indefinite.

Before we proceed to make some observations on the subject of the following Digest, and then to submit some matters connected with it for consideration, we think it right to express our acknowledgments for the assistance which we have received from many persons of high eminence and great legal acquirements. It is especially incumbent upon us to mention those due to Lord Denman, Lord Chief Justice of England, for several important suggestions; and also to William Samuel Jones, esq. of the Crown Office, relating to the practice on the Crown side of the Court of Queen's Bench.

We have also to acknowledge our obligations to many members of the legal profession who have favoured us with answers and opinions on several most important points for consideration; amongst them are many persons of extensive information derived from practice in the courts of criminal law, including recorders, magistrates, barristers, clerks of the peace, and attorneys, some of whom are clerks to magistrates in populous districts. We have, in order to facilitate the reference to their suggestions, stated in the appendix the names of those who have given their opinions on each particular question. Their observations are worthy of the most attentive consideration, and we regret that we cannot notice them in detail.

The division of the Digest is naturally regulated by the course of procedure in order of time, beginning with the earliest step which can be taken against a suspected offender, down to the execution of the sentence; to these are added the incidental proceedings by writs of habeas corpus and certiorari, and provisions as to costs and matters which could not well be introduced before without interrupting the order already proposed.

The 1st chapter includes proceedings of a preliminary nature, which occur previously to the framing or finding of the principal accusation or charge on which the suspected party is to be tried. Such preliminary proceedings are necessary for the purpose of securing the person of a suspected party, in order that he may be forthcoming to answer the demands of justice, and who might escape if a step were to be taken before a formal charge by grand jury, or other competent authority were to be made against him. Whilst, however, such a proceeding is, in numerous instances, absolutely essential to the administration of justice, yet being frequently founded on suspicion only, it is one which is not to be resorted to on slight grounds without inquiry as to its necessity; nor even after such inquiry, if reasonable security can be given for the appearance of the suspected party to answer the charge, except, indeed, in cases of great enormity, where the trusting to such security might seem to be hazardous.(b) Such are the general principles on which the numerous provisions to be found in the first chapter rest. These regard principally the granting of summonses and warrants, the arresting of suspected offenders, either with or without warrants the preliminary inquiry before magistrates, to ascertain whether there be sufficient ground for ulterior proceeding, and if so, whether it be further necessary, in cases where the law, proprio vigore, does not make the distinction, to deprive the suspected party of his liberty ad interim. This division of procedure is marked by a striking change from the course which once prevailed. In very ancient times, even during the Saxon dynasty, the practice prevailed which yet subsists in the form and proceedings of a grand jury In the reign of King Ethelred, in each hundred, the præpositus, with twelve men, charged upon oath all whom they knew to be guilty of any crime. This was the jurata delatoria, or jury of accusation, on which proceedings were founded, and by virtue of which the suspected parties were subjected to various modes of trial, including those by the ordeal and compurgation. In the reign of King Henry II. the ancient mode of proceeding, where there was no certain accuser, was, by the common fame, upon which presentments, such as are above alluded to, were made; and this continued to be the case when Bracton, Britton, and Fleta wrote. For a considerable period after this such presentments were regarded as the commencement of the prosecution, and to this day a record of the criminal prosecution, that is, the formal history of the proceedings, commences with the finding of the indictment, without any reference to the previous and preliminary inquiry; and the technical term "process" is applicable only to proceedings which occur after the indictment found, and which are used for bringing the suspected party into court to answer the charge. As well before as after the time when the present system of magistracy was established, it was competent to any person to apprehend a felon and carry him to gaol, where he was dealt with by the justices of gaol delivery. That course, however, was, after the passing of the Habeas Corpus Act, no longer efficacious. The natural consequence of the establishment of a local magistracy was, the taking preliminary cognizance of crimes, and statutable provisions became necessary, in order to regulate the course of proceeding as to examination, admission to bail, and other circumstances essential to the due administration of such powers, according to the increased exigences of society, and particularly for the purpose, in many instances, of extending the local and circumscribed powers of magistrates, so as to enable them the better to execute the power of preliminary inquiry.(c)

It will be seen from an inspection of the first chapter how much inconvenience has been experienced from the locally circumscribed economy of criminal jurisdiction. This inconvenience has been partially remedied by a host of statutes applicable in particular cases, and which have been found to be necessary in order to prevent serious and frequent failures in the administration of the penal laws. It would, we conceive, be a much more simple and efficacious course to enlarge generally the bounds of local jurisdiction than to retain such a multitude of particular provisions, which, after all, merely palliate, but do not entirely remedy the mischief, and which unnecessarily enlarge the volume of this branch of the law. We should, however, have far exceeded our powers in suggesting rules upon the mere speculation of so great a change in the system of local jurisdiction as the application of such rules would involve.

We have also to observe, that the numerous provisions contained in the mass of statutes affecting criminal jurisdiction are at present confused and perplexed; they have been passed at various times, and vary so much in their terms as frequently to leave it in doubt whether they were meant to extend to the indictment and trial only, or only to preliminary inquiry before magistrates. It has appeared to us to be desirable that, in all cases where jurisdiction is given to justices of the peace, or to commissioners of oyer and terminer, or gaol delivery, to take an indictment and proceed to trial upon it within a county or other local division, it would be expedient that the magistrates of the county or division should also have authority to make preliminary inquiry concerning the same offence; and acting upon this principle, we have reduced the enactments on this subject to a form more systematic than that which they now exhibit.

Although the seal as well as the signature of the magistrate who grants a warrant is required by some statutes, in other cases a warrant under his hand is sufficient. As it appears to us that no greater degree of authority or notoriety is attained by using a seal in addition to the mere signature, we think that it would be a more simple and expedient rule to require the signature only.

A warrant of arrest is not to be granted but on oath made of facts which shew a reasonable cause for the restraint of liberty. The question whether the circumstances of the case do afford such cause, is, however, one which must be left to the discretion of the magistrate, it being impossible to devise any other practicable test of decision.

The primitive course of raising the hue and cry in order to apprehend an offender has rarely been resorted to in modern times. Provisions for raising a posse of horse and foot for pursuing a malefactor from vill to vill, and from county to county, to the coast of the sea, are now of little use; as the ancient law still, however, exists, we conceived that we should not be justified in treating it as obsolete, and that our proper course would be to state the rules to be found in the authorities, the better to enable the legislature to judge of the propriety of retaining them.

The 2nd chapter relates to the finding and framing of the formal charge against a suspected offender, on which he is to be condemned or acquitted, a step which, as we have before stated, was, in ancient times, usually the first that was taken in a criminal prosecution by indictment, and is even yet the first which is set forth upon the record or formal history of the proceedings.

Several general rules necessarily result from the peculiar constitution of a criminal system which delegates the duty of framing a criminal charge to one class of persons, the deciding upon the truth of that charge to a second, and frequently that of adjudication to a third class. Such a distribution renders it indispensably necessary that the charge should contain such a distinct allegation of some precise offence committed, as will, if it be true, enable the judge to pronounce a sentence warranted by the law, and such statement of facts as is sufficient to shew that those concerning which inquiry is made, and evidence given, are the same with those on which the charge, if true, is founded; and also such as may serve to protect the accused against a future charge in respect of the same offence.

The first object to be attained by an indictment is certainty in law, or that certainty as to the corpus delicti which, assuming the allegations to be true, enables the Court to pronounce the proper judgment. Certainty in this respect is indispensable. The charge, as stated in the indictment, when proved to be true by the verdict of the jury, or admitted to be true by the defendant, is the legal warrant for the sentence of the Court. The sufficiency of the indictment in this respect necessarily depends on its allegation of every thing which by definition is essential to the offence. No words can more certainly describe the offence than those used in the definition; and those, or equivalent ones, the indictment must contain. With a view to other objects, it is requisite that the description of the particular offence should not be confined to the precise words of the definition, but should be amplified by a statement of particular facts and circumstances. It is, however, absolutely essential that the allegations, if true, should shew distinctly that an offence has been committed by the defendant; and if this be shewn, the indictment, as concerns its legal certainty, is substantially valid.

(a) See Corner's Practice on the Crown side.—We deem it but proper to express our opinion of this excellent work, to which frequent reference is made in our Digest: it contains, we believe, a very accurate and valuable detail of the practice on the Crown side of the Court of Queen's Bench.

(b) The propriety of admitting a prisoner charged with felony to bail ought, it has been held, to be determined with reference to the probability of his appearing to take his trial, and not with reference to the probability of the guilt or innocence of the party. (R. v. Scaife and Wife, 9 D.P.C 553.)

(c) It was not till long after the institution of justices of the peace that they were deemed to possess the authority, previous to the finding of an indictment, of issuing warrants for arresting any party on a suspicion of felony. Lord Coke (4 Inst. 77) delivers a decided opinion that a justice of the peace possesses no such power. Lord Hale, on the other hand, not only alleges that a constant practice had prevailed to the contrary, but also combats Lord Coke's opinion with much earnestness, and states, in strong terms, the inconvenience which would result from such a doctrine, and the great encouragement which it would afford to malefactors. (1 Hale, P. C. 579.) Yet, important as a certain rule in such matters must be deemed to be, none such appears to have been fully warranted by authority, even at the time when Mr. Serjeant Hawkins wrote. "It seems probable," he says, "that the practice of justices on this matter has now become a law, and that a justice may justify the granting of a warrant for the arrest of any person upon strong grounds of suspicion for a felony or other misdemeanor before any indictment hath been found against him; yet insomuch as justices claim this power rather by connivance than any express warrant of law, and since the undue execution of it may prove so highly prejudicial to the reputation as well as the liberty of the party, a justice cannot well be too tender in his proceedings of this kind." (Haw. P. C. b. 2, c. 13, s. 18.) The legality of such a procedure has been long settled, not merely by judicial decisions, but by Acts of the Legislature. The practice itself stands on the plain and obvious ground of necessity, for the purpose of securing malefactors, who would otherwise be likely to escape before they could be reached by the slow process of indictment; the principles by which it ought to be modified and limited, to prevent unnecessary injury to the reputation and liberty of individuals, are expressed as above by Mr. Serjeant Hawkins.

Another species of certainty in an indictment consists in setting forth the facts on which the charge is founded with such circumstantial particularity as may identify the offence which is the subject of trial with that submitted by the grand jury, may notify to the accused the facts and circumstances on which the legal charge is founded, and so identify the offence alleged with that to which the proof relates as to protect him against any subsequent charge in respect of the same offence. Such statistical or circumstantial certainly consists in describing the specific acts or omissions essential to the offence, with persons, motives, and intentions; with time, place, things, names, dimensions, magnitudes, quantity, and other particulars.

Certainty of this description may perhaps be sufficiently attained by means of general rules, but, with a view to general practice, more efficaciously, by specifying what particulars it is essential to state as regards each distinct species of crime.

Whilst, for the reasons alluded to, circumstantial particularity within certain limits is essential, great inconvenience and even mischief would result from the enforcement of rigid rules for the attainment of the objects proposed.

The main and obvious difficulty in the way of inflexible peremptory rules for the enforcement of circumstantial certainty results from the consideration that the jurors who find the bill may not themselves have had information on the subject. They may have had such evidence laid before them as shews sufficient grounds for finding a true bill, but without such a minute knowledge of the facts as enables them truly to state the numerous particulars of time, quantity, &c. and other circumstances of the transaction. It may and frequently does happen, that even the very name of the person, with the murder or robbery of whom the accused is charged, may be unknown, although the offence itself be most certain. So it may happen that in respect of circumstances, as, for instance, the time of committing an offence, a witness examined before the grand jury may have mistakenly stated the offence to have been committed on a wrong day, and on his examination upon the trial may correct himself. It is, therefore, apparent that to require minute circumstantial description, requiring to be satisfied by precise proof, would be dangerous and frequently impracticable. On the other hand, to exact a minute and circumstantial description, on the face of the indictment, altogether formal and unmeaning, would be plainly nugatory and absurd.

It would, for the reasons stated, be inconvenient and impolitic to require even the time of committing an offence, either to be proved precisely as alleged, or, on the other hand, to consider it to be merely formal and insignificant; it ought to be regarded as an inviolable principle, that nothing should be required to be stated on the record which is not truly stated. It is, we conceive, consistent with the object to be attained by circumstantial certainty, and also with the difficulties which we have suggested, that the rules as to mere circumstantial certainty should be regarded as directory only, that grand juries should be directed to state such circumstances only, and with no greater degree of precision than accorded with the evidence. Jurors no doubt, acting under the sanction of an oath, would attend to such instructions; circumstantial allegations, especially those of time and place, would cease to be unmeaning, and it would rarely happen that the accused was not sufficiently apprized of the particulars of the charge, to be enabled to meet it and afterwards avail himself of the verdict, should a second prosecution be instituted in respect of the same offence. In order to exclude the possibility of surprise, the Court ought to possess the power, where the exercise of it was necessary for the purposes of justice, to order the prosecutor to deliver a statement of particulars essential for the purpose of defence.

It cannot as a principle be doubted, that no certainty in circumstances ought to be required which is not to be regarded as truly made, and for a legal object; the requiring a formal degree of precision which may be wholly disregarded, cannot but be looked upon as matter of vain affectation, unworthy of the dignity of the law.

Another kind of certainty, which may be termed certainty in law and fact, consists in such a description of the charge as, independently of the use of any general technical terms, shews on the face of the indictment that the crime has been committed. This involves both the kinds of certainty,—that is of legal and circumstantial certainty as already described, and also the further certainty by which the Court is enabled to see not only that an offence has been committed, and that the facts are sufficiently detailed for the purposes of defence and identification, but also that the very facts detailed constitute the offence in point of law. An indictment for a theft, which had been accomplished by getting possession of a horse under pretence of borrowing it for a journey, but with the secret intent of selling it in fraud of the owner, and which stated all the particulars, with time, place, name, &c. would exhibit this species of certainty, because it would combine legal with mere circumstantial certainty. If, on the other hand, the indictment in the ordinary form alleged simply that the prisoner feloniously stole, took, and carried away the horse of A B, of the value of 20*l*. the indictment would not want either sufficient legal or circumstantial certainty, but it would want the certainty on which we are now observing; because the Court could not pronounce that the real circumstances of the case warranted the use of the general and technical terms "feloniously did steal," and satisfied their legal exigency. The Court pronouncing judgment, which may be a different court from that in which the offender has been tried, must, in such case, trust to the legal discretion of the latter, in requiring sufficient proof of some mode of the offence sufficient to satisfy the technical allegations. It is manifest that this kind of certainty is not absolutely essential to the attainment of justice; and it is to be observed that not only considerable inconvenience would result, but that even frequent failure of justice might be apprehended from requiring a strict detail of facts to the exclusion of general technical averments. It is further to be remarked, that the inconvenience which might otherwise result from not requiring this third kind of certainty,—that is, from not requiring such an exposition of detailed facts without the use of general technical expressions as would shew a completed crime, may be remedied when it becomes necessary by a special verdict, which will enable the Court to judge whether they are sufficient to support the charge.

The description of any offence necessarily involves that of some act done or omitted, either simply or as qualified by collateral facts, and of the circumstances and of the subject-matter in respect of which such act is done or omitted, with particulars of time, place, persons, intentions, and things; with names, number, quantities, dimensions, and other identifying circumstances. Where the act essential to a crime is described by technical words, it can rarely happen that an allegation by means of those terms .. ..ot sufficient, even although they may embrace several modes of committing the offence. Such an allegation necessarily possesses that degree of legal certainty which is essential to an indictment. For although the term be technical, yet if its meaning be accurately defined, the effect is the same as concerns the legal certainty of the charge as if the more enlarged description of the criminal act had been used. The real objection, if any exist, to the use of such an averment, must consist in the want of such a degree of particularity as is essential to the second kind of certainty which has been noticed, and the observance of which is necessary with a view to the information and protection of the accused. The objection, however, is answered, provided such a description of the subject-matter be required as is sufficient to satisfy the latter rule as to this kind of certainty. And as the description of the subject-matter is in truth amply adequate to the attainment of this object, and as the excluding the use of general abridged expressions for describing acts would be attended with a considerable degree of inconvenience and danger of failure, it follows that they ought to be permitted. By the definition of burglary, the act of breaking into a dwelling-house is essential to the offence; breaking, however, is a technical and general term which requires definition, and which, by virtue of definition, must include many distinct particular modes of breaking. Now, although it be alleged, only generally, that the prisoner broke into a dwelling-house, without specifying whether he broke open a door or descended down a chimney, either of which acts, by definition, constitutes a breaking, yet is it just as certain if he be convicted on legal evidence, that he is guilty of a breaking within the definition as if the particular mode had been specified. Neither is particularity in this respect required for the purposes of identity and information; these objects are sufficiently attained by requiring particularity as to the name of the owner of the dwelling-house, its situation, and the time of committing the offence. The transaction being thus marked and distinguished, there can be no room for doubting that the charge on which the prisoner is tried is the same with that of which he stands accused by the grand jury; and he has sufficient information given to enable him to meet the charge, and afterwards to avail himself of the verdict.

Where the definition of the offence includes an act, but one limited or qualified by defined facts, such qualifications must of course be alleged, for otherwise there would be no certainty as to the offence. When, however, the only qualification of the defined act is by negative circumstances, it seems to be generally true that they may be negatived in terms as general as those contained in the definition. If, for instance, it were part of the definition of an offence that a particular act had been unlawfully done, legal certainty would be attained by means of the allegation that the act stated to have been done was unlawfully done; it would afford no substantial information to the accused to negative specially and particularly all the lawful modes of such action; and if the act were in fact lawful, the allegation and proof would more properly be made and given on the part of the accused. On the charge of unlawfully wounding A B, the prisoner might be justified, if he could shew that what he did was in self-defence, or in various ways for the advancement of justice; but it is obviously consonant with justice and convenience that the accused, if he had any excuse for doing an act apparently unlawful, should be bound to establish his defence by allegation and proof, and that it should be sufficient on the part of the Crown to allege generally in the terms of the definition that the act was unlawful.

LEADING CASES.—No. XI.

GREEN v. PRICE.

(13 M. & W. 695.)

Covenant in restraint of trade, when divisible—Distinction between a penalty and liquidated damages.

The general rule respecting covenants or agreements in restraint of trade is laid down in the well-known case of Mitchel v. Reynolds (1 P. Wms. 181), in these words:—"In all restraints of trade, where nothing more appears, the law presumes them bad; but if the circumstances are set forth, that presumption is excluded, and the Court is to judge of those circumstances and determine accordingly; and if upon them it appears to be a just and honest contract, it ought to be maintained." "Contracts in restraint of trade," observes Tindal, C. J. in Horner v. Graves (7 Bing. 744), "are in themselves, if nothing more appears to shew them reasonable, bad in the eye of the law;" and again, in a very recent case, on this subject, that, viz. of Mallan v. May (11 M. & W. 665), Parke, B. in delivering the judgment of the Court of Exchequer, lays down the law thus: "If there be simply a stipulation, though in an instrument under seal, that a trade or profession shall not be carried on in a particular place, without any recital in the deed, and without any averments shewing circumstances which rendered such a contract reasonable, the instrument is void. But if there are circumstances recited in the instrument (or probably if they appear by averment), it is for the Court to determine whether the contract be a fair and reasonable one or not; and the test appears to be, whether it be prejudicial or not to the public interest; for it is on grounds of public policy alone that these contracts are supported or avoided. Contracts for the partial restraint of trade are upheld, not because they are advantageous to the individual with whom the contract is made, and a sacrifice, pro tanto, of the rights of the community, but because it is for the benefit of the public at large that they should be enforced." In the case of Mallan v. May, just referred to, which has been twice before the Court of Exchequer (11 M. & W. 653; 13 Id. 511), several points arose which are well worthy of attentive consideration. It there appeared, that by articles of agreement under seal, entered into between the plaintiffs and defendant, it was agreed that the defendant should become assistant to the plaintiffs in their business of surgeon-dentists for four years; that the plaintiffs should instruct him in the business of a surgeon-dentist, and that after the expiration of the term the defendant should not carry on that business in London, or in any of the towns or places in England or Scotland where the plaintiffs might have been practising before the expiration of the said service. The declaration alleged as breaches: 1st, that after the term the defendant carried on the said business in London; 2nd, that the plaintiffs had, during the said term, carried on business in great Russell-street, Bloomsbury, yet the defendant, after the term, carried on the said business in the same place. The defendant pleaded to the first breach, that London was a large and populous district, containing 1,500,000 inhabitants, and that the stipulation in the agreement was an undue, unreasonable, and unlawful restriction of trade; and the plea to the second breach stated that before the expiration of the service, the plaintiffs had practised in very many towns in England, and, amongst others, London, Preston, Oswestry, &c.; and that divers of the said towns were distant from each other 150 miles, wherefore the said stipulation was an unreasonable restriction of trade, and the said agreement as to so much was wholly void. With respect to the first of the above pleas, the Court held the same to be bad, on the ground that the covenant not to practise in London was valid, and that the question as to the reasonableness or unreasonableness of the contract being a question of law, ought not to have been raised in the above manner on the record; the second plea was, however, held to be good. "According to the terms of this covenant," observed Parke, B. "the defendant is prohibited from carrying on his business, not merely at such place or places as the plaintiffs might be practising in at the time of the expiration of the service, but at any place where they might have been practising before, though for ever so short a time. This covenant goes much beyond what the protection of any interests of the plaintiffs could reasonably require, and it puts into their hands the power of preventing the defendant from practising any where; we are therefore of opinion that it is an unreasonable restriction, and that the defendant is entitled to our judgment on the demurrer to the plea to the second breach, for the insufficiency of the declaration in that respect." Besides the above point, another arose in the same case, which is worthy of remark. It was contended for the defendant, that if the covenant entered into between the parties was bad in part, it was so altogether. The Court, however, decided, on the authority of Chesman v. Nainby (2 Lord Raym. 1456), that the stipulation as to not practising in London, which was valid, was not in any way affected by the illegality and consequent invalidity of the other part of the covenant. Subsequently to the above decision in Mallan v. May, a question was submitted for the opinion of the Court of Exchequer by the Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce, which arose in the course of proceedings before his Honour in the same case, and this question was whether the term "London," which, in its strict and legitimate sense, means the city of London only, could be taken to include Great Russell-street, which is not within the boundaries of the city. The present Lord Chief Baron, in stating the opinion which the Court had formed on this question, made the following important remarks with reference to one of the principal rules which must be observed in construing a written instrument. "We must," said he, "apply the ordinary rules of construction to this instrument, and though, by so doing, we may, in some instances, probably in this, defeat the real intention of the parties, such a course tends to establish a greater degree of certainty in the administration of the law. One of these rules is, that words are to be construed according to their strict and primary acceptation, unless from the context of the instrument, and the intention of the parties to be collected from it, they appear to be used in a different sense, or unless, in their strict sense, they are incapable of being carried into effect; and subject always to the observation that the meaning of a particular word may be shewn by parol evidence to be different in some particular place, trade, or business from its proper and ordinary acceptation. In applying this rule to the present case, we find nothing in the context to prevent us from construing the word 'London' in its proper sense as the city of London." (13 M. & W. 517-18.)

In Green v. Price (13 M. & W. 695) the general doctrine respecting covenants in restraint of trade, which had been so clearly expounded and applied in Mallan v. May, was confirmed and acted upon. That was an action of covenant, brought by the plaintiff, as surviving executor of one A, against the defendant, on a deed, which recited that A and B carried on business as perfumers in co-partnership, and that it had been agreed between them that B, in consideration of 2,100*l.* should assign to A his moiety of the good-will, stock in trade, &c. of the co-partnership, and by which deed B, in consideration of the premises, covenanted that he would not, at any time during his life, carry on the trade of a perfumer within the cities of London and Westminster, or within the distance of 600 miles from the same respectively; and for the observance of this covenant he bound himself, his heirs, &c. to A, his executors, &c. in the sum of 5,000*l.* by way of liquidated damages, and not of penalty. It was held that, although that part of the above covenant which restricted the defendant from practising within 600 miles of London was bad, as being a contract injurious to the public, and unduly restraining trade; yet the other part, relating to London and Westminster, was good, and that damages might be recovered for a breach of such last-mentioned part. In the course of the argument, Pollock, C. B. remarked that, "in later times the Courts have thought that reasonable restraints of trade are good, and that commerce is benefited thereby, because they make the trade valuable to those who carry it on;" and, in answer to the argument founded on Mitchel v. Reynolds, supra, that the reasonableness of the consideration for a bond or covenant in restraint of trade must be taken into consideration, Parke, B. observed thus: "All that doctrine about the adequacy of the consideration has been upset by Hitchcock v. Coker (1 Scott N.R. 123). The true question is, whether the contract is injurious to the public or not? If it be, it is void, if it be not, the parties may ract for what consideration they please."

Without dilating upon the topics above touched upon, we shall conclude our remarks with a reference to the distinction which exists between a sum named as a penalty and one which is agreed upon between parties as liquidated damages. In the former case, that is, where the sum is named merely as a penalty, although the jury in awarding damages cannot exceed the amount named, yet they may find a less sum as the measure of damage which the plaintiff has sustained; but where it clearly appears that the sum named is the precise sum fixed and agreed upon between the parties as liquidated damages for the non-performance of the contract, the jury are confined to that sum, and cannot award either greater or less damages. (1 Chitt. Arch. Pr. 7th ed. 325.) The leading case on this subject is that of Kemble v. Farren (6 Bing. 141), in which the parties expressly stipulated that a sum named should be liquidated and ascertained damages, and not a penalty or penal sum, or in the nature thereof, and the Court had to decide whether, in the face of this clear and express stipulation, they could hold the plaintiff entitled only to the damages actually sustained by him, in consequence of breaches of the agreement which were in their nature certain, and for which there was, consequently, a distinct remedy by the verdict of a jury. The Court held that they could do so, and by their judgment established the following rules: 1st. That in respect of breaches of an agreement which are of an uncertain nature and amount, the parties to such agreement may settle the amount of damages at any sum upon which they may agree, because in many cases such an agreement fixes that which is almost impossible to be accurately ascertained, and in all cases it saves the expense and difficulty of bringing witnesses to that point. 2ndly. That where there are clauses in the agreement relating to fixed and certain pecuniary payments, and where, in case of breach of such clauses, the damages are at once ascertainable, the sum named by the parties must be held to be a penal sum only, and not liquidated damages; for if this were not so, a very large sum might become immediately payable in consequence of the non-payment of a very small one; a case involving hardship, against which courts of equity have always relieved, and against which courts of law have, in modern times, endeavoured to relieve by directing juries to assess the real damages sustained by the breach of the agreement. (See also Astley v. Weldon, 2 B. & P. 346.)

By applying the above rules to the covenant entered into by the parties in Green v. Price, we should decide that the damages agreed upon in that case were liquidated damages, and not merely a penal , for the agreement was made on a good consideration, by which the defendant engaged not to carry on a particular trade within certain limits, and 5,000*l.* was to be paid for any breach of this engagement; the parties having thus voluntarily fixed the amount of the damages which might be sustained, and which must be, from the nature of the breach, uncertain in amount. We may observe, however, that the learned reporters of the case under consideration have, in their marginal note, stated that this point was actually decided by the Court, whereas, in fact, it was not so; Parke, B. expressly observing, "We are not now to determine whether the plaintiff is entitled to recover the stipulated damages of 5,000*l.* but only whether there has been a breach of the covenant; whether he is to recover the 5,000*l.* or only such damages as he can prove, will be a question hereafter." We mention this slight inaccuracy together with the above expression of our own opinion on this part of the case, in order that the reader, instead of placing too much reliance on the marginal note (13 M. & W. 695), may refer to the body of the report, and decide according to his judgment.

A note of Green v. Price may be made in 1 Smith's Leading Cases, 171.

PROMOTIONS, APPOINTMENTS, ETC.

Whitehall, Sept. 18.—The Queen has been pleased, by and with the advice of her Privy Council, to appoint John Richard Corballis, esq. LL.D., to be one of the Commissioners of Charitable Donations and Bequests for Ireland, in the room of the Right Hon. Anthony Richard Blake, resigned.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE SMALL DEBTS ACT AND THE COUNTY COURT.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

"He (the framer of the Small Debts Act) thinks proper to construct new machinery entirely, which nobody else can understand, and of which this Court in particular knows nothing."—Judgment of Mr. Commissioner Fane in Re Huggins.

Sir,—After the volleys of inquiries and objections discharged at this unlucky Act of Parliament—this scarecrow of modern legislation—I am only surprised that any thing remains of it, except what may be termed the pole on which it was hung, namely, the preamble that "it is expedient and just to give creditors a further remedy for the recovery of debts due to them," which certainly remains a truism quite intact, a necessity as whole and entire as ever.

But, notwithstanding the pitiless pelting it has received from judges, commissioners, barristers, attorneys, and Punch, there is a rag of the Act remaining which seems deserving comment.

Sections 1 and 4, by force of general phraseology, seem to have brought within their operation the county court of course, as notice is taken of the peculiarity of the procedure therein, and no provisions applicable thereto vouchsafed; and, although about the most ancient court in the kingdom, it is not even mentioned by name.

In some counties (see Sweet's Practice, p. 50) the under-sheriff presides in this court; in others (as in Essex), an officer called the county clerk; both are appointed by the sheriff, and are his officers.(a)

But the freeholders are the real judges of the county court, and the sheriff is the ministerial officer. (3 Comm. 36, c. 4.)

Now, to bring any court within the powers of the Small Debts Act, it must be a court having a judge, who shall be either a barrister, special pleader, or an attorney of ten years' standing. An obvious difficulty here suggests itself; but on referring to the interpretation clause, we find that in the construction of this Act the word "judge" is to mean "every person" who presides or acts as judge in "any" such court as aforesaid, whether by the title of judge, county clerk, &c. &c. or by "any" other title whatsoever. So that, by the help of a little more general phraseology, the county court seems sufficiently hooked on to the train of consequences flowing from the Act. But the want of congruity in the language of sec. 1 raises another point. The summons to debtors, it is declared, shall be lawfully issued by any commissioner of the Court of Bankruptcy, or any court of requests or conscience, or other court for the recovery of small debts. Can the county clerk issue a summons, or must it be done sedente curiâ under this clause? The practice is for the county clerk to issue process on plaints, out of court, bearing teste as of the then last court. On which Greenwood remarks, "He (the county clerk) ought to enter no plaints (except on writs of justices and in case of replevins) out of court, but in full county (sedente curiâ); yet the use is otherwise at this day, and (as it seems) good enough, verifying the proverb, Communis error facit jus." Supposing, for a moment, that the meaning of the Act is ambiguous, will the communis error be good enough when carried further in a matter ejusdem generis?

I think the framer of this "ingenious device" to puzzle people could never have intended that the county clerk, the quasi judge of the county court, should not have the power of summoning, because before we get to the end of the section, we find that "it shall be lawful for such commissioner or the judge of such court" to commit the debtor. This construction is strengthened by the fact that in the same section one cause of committal is to be, if the debtor "shall not make answer to the satisfaction of the commissioner or court," in which instance the word "court" must be taken to mean (if it mean any thing) the county clerk, who is the party authorized to commit, and with whom the responsibility of such committal rests.

The mischievous consequences of a contrary construction to that for which I contend may not be obvious to all, as it is not to be expected that every reader, any more than the Act of Parliament-maker, should be intimately acquainted with the constitution of the county court; I beg, therefore, to quote the 2 Edw. 6, c. 25, by which it is enacted that after that session of Parliament "no county court or courts thereafter to be kept within this realm shall be longer deferred but one month from court to court, and so the said courts from thenceforth shall be kept every month, and none otherwise." The delay arising from a necessity of being obliged to obtain a summons sedente curiâ, and which can only be made returnable at the next court, will be now very apparent.

I shall be glad to see any additional topic urged in confirmation of my view, that the intention of the Act is to vest the power of summoning, like that of committal, in the judge or quasi judge of courts of requests and county courts, in the same way as it is vested in the commissioners of the Court of Bankruptcy.

I cannot leave the subject without recommending to the concoctor of this Act "six lessons (by William Cobbett), intended to prevent statesmen from using false grammar, and from writing in an awkward manner."

O Ephraim Jenkinson! you of the Vicar of Wakefield, the "Law of Bankruptcy and Insolvency" is evidently to one Brougham and Vaux what the "cosmogony or creation of the world" was to thee! You both quoted Greek—you both pretended to know every thing, and deceived every body! I wish that you, O Vaux! would imitate Ephraim in his repentance, and say candidly to the commercial public, as Jenkinson in prison did to the worthy Doctor Primrose, "I am heartily sorry, Sir, that I ever deceived you, or, indeed, any man, for you see what my tricks have brought me to." How affecting this would sound in the mouth of Vaux, pointing with outspread hand to Punch's merciless caricatures, and Punch's edition of the Small Debts Act.

LEGAL EDUCATION.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

SIR,—Observing, on perusing the last two numbers of the LAW TIMES, that this subject is likely again to be discussed, allow me to offer the following observations, in the hope that, through the intervention of your widely-circulated columns, some method will be devised by which an improvement may be effected.

The examination in its present shape is by no means a sufficient criterion of the candidate's ability, albeit he may answer satisfactorily the whole of the questions put to him; the repetition of many, at each succeeding examination, having rendered them familiar to all. This repetition, it is obvious, cannot be avoided without increasing the difficulty of the examination by the adoption of fresh ones at each; to obviate this, I would suggest that the questions in future should not, as heretofore, be published; this I think would prevent the system of cramming, by compelling the candidates to devote more time to serious reading, a course infinitely more beneficial than "a three months' study and perusal of the old questions." Knowledge so rapidly acquired is generally as rapidly forgotten.

The inequality on which the clerks are placed speaks plainly against the justice of classing them or awarding distinctions. If, as at the Universities, all were prepared by a similar course of study, the case would be altered. What chance, I would ask, has a youth going up for examination immediately on the expiration of his articles against a person who may have acted for ten years as a managing clerk since the expiration of his? Or, again, of one coming direct from the country as opposed to another who has spent one year of his articles in the office of an agent, and probably passed another in counsel's chambers? Unless the mode of conducting the examination be totally changed, the candidates can never, with justice, be classed, or distinctions awarded. To effect this desirable object, I would suggest the following alteration:—By the rules for conducting the examination a candidate is required to give one term's notice of his intention to apply for examination; on such notice being received, let each be furnished with a list of books from which the questions, practical and theoretical, will be framed, such list to be chosen by the examiners, and the questions to be therefrom selected on no account to be published after the examination. I would further propose that the three candidates who give the most satisfactory answers in each of the five branches be classed accordingly, making it imperative that to obtain such distinction a certain number of the questions in each shall be answered. By the adoption of this or a similar plan, whilst it would entail little additional trouble upon the examiners, to whom the Profession are already sufficiently indebted, each candidate would be placed upon an equal footing, and the idle very properly prevented acquiring that undeserved honour they could (should distinctions be given under the present mode) so easily obtain to the exclusion of those far more worthy of it.

Of the inexpediency of a classical examination I could say much, but I feel, Sir, that I have already trespassed too far upon your pages. Hoping, therefore, that this important subject will not be lost sight of, but rather that abler pens may be enlisted in the cause,

I am, Sir, yours, &c.

PROFESSIONAL IMPROPRIETIES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

SIR,—Allow me to call your attention to a system which has recently been, on more than one occasion, adopted by a party practising the profession of the law for the purpose of obtaining the business consequent on his client's death, when the executors and trustees of his client are those of another practitioner. Thus, after the death of the testator, the solicitor concerned for him in his lifetime applies to one of the executors, who is known to be the client of another, for the business of the executorship, and produces a paper writing (drawn up by himself, and unconnected with the will) to the effect that such were the wishes of the testator. The existence of such retainer (if it may bear that term) is unknown to the executors, as likewise to the friends and relatives of the deceased, till produced, for the purpose I mention, after the testator's death. On one occasion the solicitor thus claiming employment declined to give up the will to the executor when twice requested to do so (the reason for which is obvious). I shall feel obliged by the free canvass of this question of professional etiquette in your columns, and the opinion of any of your readers whether such a course can be sanctioned as coming within the pale of strict professional propriety.

LOCAL COURTS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

SIR,—Permit me to call the attention of the members of the Profession to the Schedule of Fees, under the 8 Vict. c. 127, by which it will be perceived those payable to the clerks are considerably more than those payable to the judges; consequently, as regards emolument, the clerk has the advantage of the judge; and in some instances it will operate in a singular manner. Thus in this town there is a court of requests having local jurisdiction over the whole island for the recovery of debts not exceeding 5*l.* presided over by a body of commissioners (without a judge), having a clerk and subordinate officers, and this clerk is nothing more or less than a clerk in an attorney's office (not articled); yet he will, provided the commissioners allow him to continue in office, receive a higher salary than the chief officer of the court; however, there are several members of the Profession candidates for the appointment, and it is to be hoped the commissioners (looking at the responsible duties attached to the office by virtue of the above Act) will remove their present clerk, having power so to do under the existing local Act; the words being, after specifying several causes for removal, "or any other sufficient cause;" and it is contended that the extension of jurisdiction as to amount; the receiving of all fees of the court and of all moneys paid into the court; the paying the judge and other officers; the communicating with the Secretary of State; the working of the whole machinery of the Act, and the increase of emolument, which cannot be less than 300*l.* per annum, ought to be considered a sufficient cause for removal, and the appointment of a member of the Profession to fill the situation.

ATTORNEYS' GOWNS.

SIR,—In reply to the letter on this subject in your paper of the 6th inst. THOMAS PARKER, Jun.
Cambridge Sept. 17, 1845.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

SIR,—A friend of mine has sent me an extract from the LAW TIMES of the 30th of August last, containing a copy of a circular which I issued on coming to this place, with your animadversions upon it, as being "a direct violation of the rules of strict professional conduct," and as such deserving to be ranked "among the exceptionable addresses which you consider it your duty to reprehend." Now, Sir, I must beg to be allowed to say that this is the first time I have ever heard that there was any thing either irregular or unprofessional for one professional gentleman, on succeeding to the office and business of another, to issue circulars to the clients of the latter, informing them of that fact, and soliciting a continuance of their business; on the contrary, I believe it to be the daily practice of solicitors of undoubted respectability. My circular was not publicly advertised in the papers, or by handbills, or otherwise, but was wholly confined to such persons whose names appeared as clients on the books of my late predecessor; and as it stated on the face of it that it was "by the permission and recommendation of his executors," I cannot but think that it ought to have been exempted from the publicity and animadversions which (no doubt with the best motives) you have given to it. I can assure you, Sir, I am as jealous of the honour and respectability of the profession to which I belong as you or your informant can possibly be. Trusting to your impartiality to insert this in your next number,

I am yours, &c.
Colne, Sept. 13, 1845. GEO. JONES.

[We readily give place to our correspondent's letter; but repeat our remark that to issue a printed circular of the nature indicated is an irregularity. Mr. Jones, however, states that till he read our reprehension of his act he was unaware that the course he had adopted was not strictly within professional etiquette, which is a sufficient apology for the act itself.—ED. THE LAW TIMES.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 20, 1845.

UNCERTIFICATED ATTORNEYS.

A CUSTOM has prevailed too long at the police-offices and minor courts, of permitting uncertificated attorneys, and indeed others who have even less right than they, to practise and discharge those duties which strictly belong, and should therefore be confined, to the regularly-constituted members of the Profession. Because this custom has had its origin in one of the most amiable of principles—toleration—because it is common, and has long usage to plead as justification, it is not the less injurious, nor is the necessity abated that the evil should be removed.

It may be well for old-established and respectable practitioners to rely on their own high character, and to say,—which by implication they do,—that if the public is silly enough to employ such men, it must bear the consequences of its own imprudence. But it is no less a duty of each member of the Legal Profession to protect the public, by making every effort to provide for it proper persons, and proper persons only, to whom to confide its interests, than to discharge his own functions with integrity and zeal. The man who practises without a certificate, and he who has never held one, are just the men to resort to personal application for employment; and of the success which follows such a course every one at all acquainted with human nature, and the unwillingness of people to say "No," is familiar. We repeat, then, that equally for the sake of the public as for the respectability of the Profession, every effort should be made to weed out from the courts characters who bring upon lawyers all the odium they bear.

We were led to throw together these hasty remarks from having seen in a daily paper a report of certain proceedings at the Worship-street Police-court; where, at the instance of a solicitor named VANN, who deserves the thanks of the Profession for his services on this occasion, the magistrate, Mr. BINGHAM, determined to give a hearing to no "Sham-Lawyer" for the future; adding at the same time, that, having received instructions to that effect from the Secretary of State, he would take every means in his power to put an end to their interference, and exterminate race. We give a report of the proceedings on this occasion, and hope that the becoming example of Mr. VANN in objecting to, and Mr. BINGHAM in refusing to hear, parties who, practising as attorneys, are uncertificated, will be widely imitated throughout the country:

WORSHIP-STREET.—SHAM ATTORNEYS.—Mr. Vann, the solicitor, addressing Mr. Bingham, said he had an application to make upon a subject of great public importance, one which materially affected the respectability of the court and the character of the profession to which he had the honour to belong.

He stated that the complaint to which he invited the magistrate's attention referred to the conduct of certain individuals, who had been allowed to practise in the capacity of attorneys at that court without the slightest legal qualification or a shadow of pretension to that character. The persons to whom he alluded might be comprised under two distinct classes, the first of whom, though they had received a professional education, had been unable to take out their annual certificates of qualification; and the second consisting of persons who, although wholly ignorant of the principles and practice of the law, and generally of disreputable character, were in the habit of passing themselves off as clerks to gentlemen actually on the rolls, and accepting such paltry retainers for their doubtful services as could never be offered to respectable members of the Profession. The injurious effect of such practices upon the public interest required no comment, and the detriment inflicted upon qualified practitioners would be manifest when he stated that the aggregate cost of their certificates alone amounted to no less a sum than 85.000*l.* per annum. In reference to the persons last mentioned, he begged to draw the magistrate's attention to the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, by a section in which all persons practising without being duly qualified by certificate, were held incapable of recovering any fees; and the 32nd section enacted that "any attorney or solicitor who shall wilfully and knowingly permit or suffer his name to be in any way made use of in any action or suit, upon the account or for the profit of an unqualified person, shall, upon proof thereof upon oath, to the satisfaction of any superior court, be struck off the rolls, and for ever after be disabled from practising as an attorney or solicitor. And further, it shall be lawful for the said Court to commit such unqualified person to the prison of such court, without bail or mainprize, for any term not exceeding one year." The learned gentleman then referred to the conduct of several persons who had acted as described, and with respect to one of whom he had received a communication from Mr. Timm, the solicitor to the Board of Stamps and Taxes, which officially notified that his certificate had expired in November 1842, and had not since been renewed, although the magistrate must be well aware that he had been constantly engaged up to the present time in the prosecution and defence of cases of every description at that court.

Mr. Bingham said that he entirely concurred in the views expressed by the learned gentleman, and was most desirous of furthering them; as he himself received express directions from the Secretary of State for the exclusion of all unqualified practitioners. The facts just disclosed by the applicant had not been previously brought under his notice, and he had not been aware of their existence in that court; but henceforth he should certainly take the most effectual means in his power for their suppression.

In the course of the day, one of the persons referred to having presented himself to conduct the defence in a trivial case of footway obstruction,

Mr. Vine, the chief clerk, communicated to him the subject of the complaint before stated, and formally required the production of his certificate, before he entered upon the matter in dispute.

After some evasive and irrelevant observations, the psuedo solicitor, who appeared completely confounded at the unexpected demand, ultimately declined to accede to it, and abruptly quitted the court, greatly disconcerted, and to the evident chagrin and astonishment of the client who had "retained" him.

A COURSE OF LECTURES ON THE LAW OF CONTRACTS,

By PROFESSOR CAREY.

Delivered at the University College.

LECTURE V.

IF the subject-matter of an agreement is illegal in itself, it is immaterial whether the agreement be by parol or by specialty. In either case the contract is, as between the parties cognizant of the transaction, absolutely void ab initio. Nothing becomes due upon the contract, no right of action is created by it; and if an action is brought upon the agreement, it will be a sufficient answer by the defendant to plead the illegality of the agreement or the consideration. This is not only the case with parol contracts, in which a consideration is necessary, but even in specialties, though without a consideration. It may be otherwise good, yet, if the consideration is illegal, the contract is void. See Collins v. Blantern (2 Wilson, 347); and there is another case to the same effect, Stanley v. Jones (7 Bing. 369). The case of Collins v. Blantern was this. A bond was given conditioned for the payment of 350*l.* It was given under these circumstances. There were five indictments for perjury to be tried against five persons; and in all of these prosecutions a man of the name of Rudge was the prosecutor. An agreement was entered into between the five persons indicted, and Rudge did not appear to give evidence in any of the prosecutions. The consideration was, that Collins should give him a promissory-note for 350*l.* and three of the persons indicted entered into a bond to indemnify Collins for giving the note; Collins paid Rudge the 350*l.* upon the note, and he sued one of the parties to the bond for the indemnity thereby secured; he called upon one of the parties who had escaped from the indictment by his means to pay him the indemnity. The defendant relied upon the illegality of the consideration, and the Court held that the agreement was utterly void, as being made upon a contract to tempt a man to transgress the law, and to do that which is injurious to the community. If the illegality is not apparent on the face of the instrument, it may be proved afterwards by parol evidence, of which there is a more recent case of the Gas-light Company v. Turner (5 Bing. N.C. 666). It was the case of the lease of a house for illegal purposes. It was an action of covenant against the defendant for rent of demised premises; the plea alleging that the contract was entered into between the parties to violate the 25 Geo. 3, c. 77, making preparations from tar in greater quantities than was allowed by the statute. It was held that it made no difference to the legality whether the contract was by parol or deed under seal. Here, then, was an action for rent secured by deed, and the illegality of the contract was set up as a defence.

Having made these observations on such contracts as are void at common law, I shall now proceed to those made so by express enactments of the legislature. Under this head are included such gaming transactions as fall within the statute 6 Chas. 2, c. 9, and stock-jobbing transactions in the British funds (10 Geo. 2, c. 8). Also contracts made on a Sunday in the way of ordinary dealing; (simoniacal contracts) (29 Chas. 2, c. 7); illegal charges on benefices, and contracts against the usury laws.

With respect to contracts on a Sunday, the rule is, as I have stated, that contracts made on a Sunday, in the way of a man's ordinary calling, are bad. And then, in the case of a farmer who hires a labourer for a year, the hiring taking place on a Sunday, the question is, whether that is a valid hiring. The way in which this was set up was, as to whether he was settled in the parish; and it was held that the hiring was good. If the enactment had been intended to be general, the legislature would have used general terms, instead of enumerating certain particular things.

There is the case of Smith v. Sparrow (4 Bing. 84), in which the contract was held bad. An action was brought for the breach of a contract in not accepting certain nutmegs which the defendants were alleged to have agreed to purchase for 4,600*l.* It was held the action would not lie, because the bargain was made on a Sunday.

With respect to usurious contracts, by the statute of 12 Anne, st. 2, c. 16, s. 1, all contracts are prohibited whereby any person shall take, directly or indirectly, for the loan of any monies, more than the rate of 5 per cent. per annum; besides which it is enacted, that all bonds, contracts, and assurances for the payment of interest on money borrowed at the rate of more than 5 per cent. shall be utterly void. If the contract is in its nature a usurious loan, it does not signify under what form it is disguised. It was said in Floyer v. Edwards (Cowper, 114) by Lord Mansfield, "We must get at the nature and substance of the transaction, the view of the parties must be ascertained, to satisfy the Court that there is a loan and borrowing, and that the substance was to borrow on the one part, and lend on the other; and where the real truth is a loan of money, the wit of man cannot find the shift to take it out of the statute." There is a case in Campbell frequently referred to, wherein the nature of the transaction was endeavoured to be concealed by a fictitious sale of ostrich feathers to the borrower, for a sum of money returned some time in the same day, so that the party paid in money 5 per cent. upon 90*l.* instead of 100*l.*; paying 10*l.* for the ostrich feathers This was a case of the same kind as that in which goods were given as part of the money transaction. The plaintiff discounted a bill for the defendant, and required him to take the whole or part of the amount in goods; and when that is the case, the onus lies on the plaintiff to prove that the goods were of the value represented, and that the transaction was not for the purpose of evading the laws of usury. Then there is the case of Floyer v. Edwards, where goods were sold and delivered. A gold refiner sold gold at three months' credit, with an agreement that if the money remained unpaid after that time, the purchaser should allow him a halfpenny an ounce per month, till the debt was discharged. The gold refiner not being paid, sued the purchaser, and the defence relied on was, that the contract was usurious. On the other side it was shewn that this was the general usage of the trade, and the Court held that it was a bonâ fide sale, and not a borrowing under a colouring; and that it was not a usurious contract. In the other case of the sale of the feathers, it was clearly a lending of the money under the cover of that sale; but here the real transaction was substantially a buying, and then the party created a debt in respect of the sale; but it does not appear that it was a loan, and it was not therefore usurious. By the statute of Anne, all securities for the performance of a usurious contract are made utterly void. If a promissory note, or a bill of exchange, or a bond, was given upon a usurious consideration, it was a complete nullity. If I receive 100*l.* loan, and give a promissory note for the payment a year hence of 110*l.* this will be giving 10 per cent. and is therefore usurious; the note itself is utterly void, a mere piece of waste paper; and the contract cannot be enforced under any circumstances; not even if it were put in circulation, and comes, for a valuable consideration, into the possession of a person altogether ignorant of the original transaction. (1 Williams's Saunders, 225, note 1.) By the statute 58 Geo. 3, c. 93, it is enacted that no bill of exchange or promissory note to be given for a usurious contract, shall be put in the hands of an indorsee who has received for a valuable consideration, without notice of the contract. If a bill of exchange is indorsed to a man, and he becomes the holder as a matter of business, if he give value for it, and does not know any thing of the usurious contract, he is entitled to recover against the person who is liable upon the bill. If he did not give value for it, he is in the same position as the person who took it. By a subsequent Act, 5 & 6 Wm. 4, c. 41, notes, bills, mortgages, and the like, given for a consideration arising out of gaming, usurious, and certain other illegal transactions, which under former statutes would have been absolutely void, are held to have been made for an illegal consideration; that is to say, they cannot be enforced as between the parties, and they confer no right on any one who is cognizant of the original transaction: but as to an innocent party, who has given value for them, they are available. The laws against usury have within a few years been greatly relaxed. The statute 3 & 4 Wm. 4, c. 98, and that which is now in operation, 2 & 3 Vict. c. 37, continued by the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 45, till the 1st of January, 1846, whereby bills of exchange, and promissory notes, payable within twelve months, and contracts for loans of money, not being on landed securities, are exempt from the usury laws; and in these cases any amount of interest stipulated for may be taken. For usurious contracts, words of express prohibition are contained in the statute. But besides this, every contract made for or about any matter or thing prohibited or made unlawful by the statute, is a void contract, though the statute does not mention that it shall be so; but only inflicts a penalty on the holder, because a penalty implies a prohibition. There is the case of Bartlett v. Vinor (Carthew, 252). By the statute 17 Geo. 3, it is required that bricks for sale shall be of a certain size, and a penalty is given for the breach of that regulation. A brickmaker made and sold bricks of less size than that specified by the statute. It is not said that the bricks shall be "made," but it is bricks "shall be of a certain size." The purchaser received and used the bricks, and an action was brought against him for the price. It was urged that he had used the bricks, and the contract was executed, and that he was liable to pay a reasonable price for the articles. It was ruled by Lord Ellenborough that this was a fraud upon the part of the buyer, as it turned out to be that the bricks were not of the proper size. See also Law v. Hodson (11 East, 300). Then there is another recent case (Forster v. Taylor, 5 B. & Ad. 887, and 3 L. & M. 211). Forster supplied Taylor with butter, and sued him for the price. Taylor's defence was, "Your barrels were not branded." It is required that there shall be a brand put upon every barrel of butter, denoting the name of the maker, and so forth. No such brands had been put upon these barrels, and this was held to be an answer to the action; the penalty being to protect the public against fraud; therefore all dealings contrary to the provisions of the Act were deemed to be prohibited. If goods for importation, which no enactment has prohibited, are sold and delivered abroad, this in itself is a valid transaction, though the goods be afterwards smuggled into England. (Holman v. Johnson, 1 Cowper, 341.) The mere selling them abroad is not illegal, even though the goods shall be afterwards smuggled; but if the seller had undertaken to deliver them in England, or if he had any concern in the bringing them to England, he would have been an offender against the laws of this country, and the contract could not be enforced. (Clarges v. Peneluma, 4 T. R. 466.) And there is another case (Pellecat v. Angell, 5 Tyr. 945).

This part of the subject may be summed up in the words of Parke, B. in Cope v. Rowlands (2 M. & W. 149):—"It is perfectly settled that where the contract which the plaintiff seeks to enforce, be it express or implied, is expressly or by implication forbidden by the common or statute law, no Court will lend its assistance to give it effect. It is equally clear that a contract is void if prohibited by a statute, though the statute inflicts a penalty only, because such a penalty implies a prohibition."

Upon which point the case I have already quoted to you bears. (The London Gas-Light Company v. Turner.)

A voyage undertaken against the smuggling laws of this country is illegal; every contract relating to such a voyage is therefore void. Where goods are sold and delivered abroad, the sale is valid, though the goods be afterwards smuggled into England; and an action lies in England to re-[illegible] the price, though the party knew that the goods were to be smuggled; at least, if he be a foreigner. (Pellecat v. Angell.) If a party take part in these illegal transactions, the sale is void, and he cannot recover, whether an Englishman or a foreigner. So that if goods for exportation, which are prohibited, are smuggled into the country, an insurance made upon them is void. (Biggs v. Lawrence, 3 T. R. 454; Waymell v. Reid, 5 T. R. 599; also Parkin v. Dick, 11 East, 502; and a case in 2 Campbell, 291.) But a voyage undertaken against the smuggling laws of another country is not illegal here; any contract relating to such a voyage is valid, and may be enforced in this country. "For many years," says Lord Abinger (5 Tyr. 948), "we ourselves made extensive foreign exports in direct violation of the laws of the continental powers for their exclusion. If, indeed, the seller take an actual efficient share in the illegal adventure, by packing of the goods in packages of a prohibited size, or otherwise, he must take the consequences of his own act; but the mere sale by a foreigner to a person who intends to break our fiscal law is not void as an illegal contract." See the case of Barber v. Fletcher (Douglas, 305); and in the Cases temp. Lord Hardwick, p. 183. The same law is held in 3 Kent's Commentaries, 262.

I have hitherto supposed a contract to be made between one person on one side, and one person on the other. It may happen that one person may be interested in a good right, or may be presumed to have some liability. If A and B enter into a contract to pay 200*l.* to X, so that each is to pay 100*l.* A is liable separately for 100*l.* and B liable separately for 100*l.* In this case A and B are separately liable, each for their share of it. If A and B enter into a contract to pay 200*l.* to X, each himself undertaking to pay the whole, then A may be sued for the whole, or B may be sued for the whole. In this case A and B are severally liable, each for the whole debt. (Lee v. Nixon, 1 A. & E. 201.) If A and B jointly enter into a contract with X for the purchase of certain goods to be supplied by X, they must both be sued together for the debt incurred; they are jointly liable for the whole debt. In the following case, the liability is both joint and several. X lets a house for a year to Y, at a rent of 200*l.*; A and B covenant for themselves, and all of them each for himself, to pay the rent. A and B covenant for themselves by a joint covenant, and each of them for himself by a separate covenant. If the rent is in arrear and unpaid, the landlord may at his option sue both together, or either of them separately, for the whole; they are jointly liable for the whole, and they are severally liable for the whole. In case of a joint liability, there is only one debt: in the case of a several liability, there are as many separate debts as there are persons bound by the contract—as many separate and distinct debts as there are debtors. When covenants are several, the several debts are written on one and the same parchment. (Lee v. Nixon.) In a joint and several liability, it is at the option of the creditor either to treat it as constituting one debt, for which all are jointly liable; or to treat it as many debts, each party being individually liable for the whole. He may treat it as a joint debt, and sue all the parties; or he may treat it as a separate debt, and sue any one of them by himself. If he sues them all, he treats it as one debt, which they are jointly liable to pay. If he treats it otherwise, he must treat it as a debt which each is severally liable to pay, and then he must not sue them jointly. If he sues two, it is not upon their separate liability. If it was a joint liability, it would be a liability to which the three are liable, and that may be pleaded in abatement. Much of this matter, which does not appear easy at first sight, will be clear if you recollect that where there is a joint liability there is one debt; and where there are several liabilities it may be considered as two debts. Where the liability is joint, the discharge of one is a discharge of the liability as to all. (Matthew's case, 5 Coke, 22, and Cro. Eliz. 407.) If there are two persons jointly liable, and you give a release to one of them, the other is released also. (2 Williams's Saunders, 47, and Todd v. Emly, 9 M. & W.) In the last case, a wine-merchant had supplied wine to a client. He brought an action in order to prove Emly's liability in connection with another person. There was no question that if Emly was liable he would have been jointly liable with him; but a release was executed and given to him, in order to make him a good witness, and it was held that, by his being released from the debt, all the parties were released from the debt, and therefore it was a discharge of Emly, the defendant. They said, as in a case of joint and several liability, if there is a liability joint and several, the release of one is the release of all; but not so if it is merely a several liability, because there are two debts, and each one is liable distinctly and separately from the other. A several liability is often created by some express contract, wherein the liability of the parties is denoted by the terms that are employed. The rule is, a person contracting together with the same parties for one and the same account, we may regard it as joint, unless express words are used to shew that a distinct, as well as an entire, liability was intended to be created. These contracts made in the ordinary course of business are joint. In all cases in which a debt is incurred by persons in partnership, or in a joint interest or subject-matter of the contract, the liability is joint; and this is only the case in respect to implied contracts. If several persons make up a party to dine together at a tavern, they are all jointly liable for the general expense. (3 Campb. 49.) It may be that the table was ordered by one who made himself simply answerable for the whole; or it may be that the landlord may have entered into a contract to supply as many as should come at so much a head, so as to make it a contract between him and the individuals.

The doctrine of joint liability appears to be peculiar to the English law, and it has been raised, not so much on any principle belonging to the law of contracts, as on the rule by which legal proceedings in an action are regulated. If two men assault another, they are, in a certain sense, jointly and severally liable for the damages. The person assaulted may sue both together, or he may sue either separately, and the damages ascertained in one case may be a compensation for the injuries done to him. If he sues one, that one must alone pay the damages; if he sues both together, they are each liable to pay the whole, and he may take out execution against either or both, at his pleasure. If he receives payment from one, that discharges the other from his liability; but the one who has paid cannot come upon the other for his share, as it is a general rule that among wrong-doers there is no contribution. (Merewether v. Nixon, 8 T. R. 36.) In an action founded on contract, the case is different. If two persons are sued as on a joint liability, the creditor may issue execution against one party, and levy the whole on him, as in the case of assault; but when he has paid, the one can call on the other to contribute his share. What the amount of it is will depend on the nature of the transaction between themselves.

Where the liability is joint, both parties must be joined in one action. This very frequently occurs where one of the parties liable is originally and personally interested in the contract, and the other enters into a liability to answer for the performance of his agreement; the one being called principal, and the other surety. Two persons entering into a bond; one is not satisfied that the other may be able to perform his engagement, or he may not choose to rely on his character, and requires a third person to join in it, the extent of the liability depending on the terms of the agreement. In Collins v. Prosser (1 B. & C. 682), one J. B. Mainwaring was appointed receiver of the county of Middlesex. He entered into a bond for the due performance of his engagements, in which he was bound in 12,000*l*., and three sureties, each binding himself for 1,000*l*. That is an instance which does not very often occur; a several liability, each for the amount of obligation; and every one of these sureties was ruled to be separate, as though they were several debtors responsible for separate debts. The bond had been cancelled as to one of the three sureties. Now, if the obligation had been joint, that is, if there had been but one deed, it being cancelled as to one, it would have been cancelled as to all; just as if, being one debt, it had been made by one debtor. The debt would have been extinguished as to the rest. If the contract had been joint and several, it would have been extinguished; but the liability being merely several, the cancelling of the bond as to one left it in force as to the others; just as the payment of his share by one would have left the other liable to pay his share. Then there is the case of Lee v. Nixon. If there are in the same instrument the names of two sureties, then they are each of them liable for the same sum; so that if the sum due by the principal is 100*l*. and two sureties are made liable severally for 100*l*.; that is to say, each for the whole, if one of the sureties is sued alone, he may not only look for indemnity to his principal, as to the whole sum, but come on the other surety for his contribution. If in the last case (Lee v. Nixon) there had been two sureties for the payment of the rent, each of them severally liable for the sum, the trustees might have recovered from either of the two, and that one might have sued his principal for the whole, or his co-surety for one-half; both being bound in the same penalty, and owing one and the same debt. (Davies v. Humphries.) This claim is not founded on a contract, but on a principle of equity. The sureties may have never seen one another; though they have both undertaken to answer for another person, their undertaking may have been perfectly independent. This action is, in the language of the Roman law, quasi ex contractu. In the language of Lord Eldon, the right depends on a principle of equity rather than on a contract. When any surety makes any payment on behalf of his principal, whether as to the whole sum or any part of it, whatever he has paid it may be recovered from the principal; but in the case of a co-surety it is different; he can only recover what he has paid over and above his own proportion. (Pitt v. Purrsford, 8 M. & W. 538.) In Davies v. Humphries, it was contended that where one party has paid the sum, he then has a claim on his co-surety to recover one-half of that sum, supposing them each to be separately liable. The question arising in Davies v. Humphries was with regard to the running of the Statute of Limitations. Some payments had taken place more than six years before, and some of them had not. The question was, whether the Statute of Limitations began from the time of the first payment made, or whether it only began to run from the time that one-half was paid. It was held that it only began to run from the time one-half was paid

LINCOLN'S INN NEW HALL AND LIBRARY.

THE subjoined description of the magnificent pile of buildings recently erected in Lincoln's-inn, we extract from the Athenæum The acumen displayed by the writer, the truth and justice of his remarks on the architectural taste of the Lawyers and his graphic pencilling of the [illegible] buildings will be fully relished by our readers:—

The lawyers have not shewn themselves to be patrons of architecture, at least not in those localities where they congregate professionally, for the Inns of Court contribute as little as may be to the embellishment of London. In fact, those inns have scarcely any sort of sign externally to indicate their presence to the stranger; and, when entered, are found to possess very little of positive architectural character, being chiefly remarkable for courts and alleys, whose air of sullen seclusion contrasts forcibly with the bustle of the adjacent streets. Though some of the courts—Gray's-inn-square, for instance—are spacious enough, and regularly built, yet they are quite destitute of all nobleness of appearance. Their physiognomy is neither antique nor modern; [illegible]ed of a venerable, they have a strangely haggard look; and instead of being picturesque, they are merely [illegible] shabby, and dismal. These last epithets cannot, indeed, be applied to some of the newer ranges of buildings, for they are at present spruce and jaunty, but of very plebeian, not to say Cockney expression. Even the new part of what is called Paper-buildings in the Temple, and Harcourt-buildings on the opposite side of the garden, scarcely form an exception, since, if not actually faulty, they are at best only respectably decent and monotonously dull. The same may be said of Serjeant's-inn, which has been metamorphosed from grotesque ugliness into smirking insipidity. If the merely forlorn-looking be the picturesque, our Dr. Syntaxes may find it in St[illegible] Inn; which, however, can now shew a tolerably goodly piece of Elizabethan architecture, erected about two years ago; though as to being shewn, it may almost as well be said to be put out of sight. On the opposite side of Holborn we have what is by courtesy called an [illegible] to wit, Furnival's Inn—which rejoices in its [illegible]omplete modern character; it having [illegible]n entirely re-erected just before the present [illegible]ry went out of its teens; and a curious [illegible]ample it is of what was then considered to be architectural taste. There is, too, if the truth may be spoken, a dash of Pecksniffian taste in the range of modern Gothic buildings of the Temple—the Library, &c. on the terrace-walk facing the garden.(a) The same remark applies, and in even stronger degree, to the modern Gothicizings in Lincoln's-Inn; but the stigma they inflicted upon the generation which perpetrated them is, if not effaced, forgotten in the noble architectural achievement just accomplished by the erection of the new pile of building, which challenges a critical scrutiny by its merits, and commands general admiration by its magnitude and imposing ensemble.

In addition to its own intrinsic merit, the new structure, containing hall and library, is so happily situated as to form one of the most conspicuously placed architectural objects in the metropolis; one that shews itself advantageously from every point of view, and from whose windows a most enviable rus-in-urbe prospect may be enjoyed of "trim garden," bounded by the handsome range of Stone-buildings on one side, and of the park-like inclosure of Lincoln's Inn-fields on the other. What adds not a little to its nobleness of appearance is, that the new building stands upon a raised terrace; which is attended with this further advantage, that the basement floor is sunk only a very few feet lower than the general level of the ground; and what shews itself externally as a basement for the offices is a low ground-floor, or mezzanine, between them and the hall and other upper rooms. So well is the building laid out, that although regular and even symmetrical in plan in the direction of its length, the exterior is marked by great variety of outline, at the same time free from any little finical tricks of the picturesque; it being thrown into well-contrasted and well-balanced masses, as is naturally dictated by the disposition of the principal parts of the interior. We have here that kind of grouping which is one distinctive characteristic of the style itself—at least of the class of buildings which afford the best examples of the style, namely, collegiate ones. Mr. Barry would probably have treated the subject differently—would have shewn us singleness of composition in one continuous line of building from end to end, with very little external articulation of the plan; nor do we pretend to say that such treatment would have been unsuccessful in his hands. Still we are well content with what we here behold; and are of opinion that the placing the Library transversely to, instead of a continuation of, the main line of building, is highly favourable, not only occasioning a certain piquantness of ensemble, but also giving the extent in regard to depth. From this circumstance the building acquires considerable importance as seen obliquely in a north-west view of it, which satisfies us better than that of the other end, although the latter is evidently marked out as the principal one. For our own part, however, we cannot help feeling that what is there intended for a handsome architectural accessory and a completing feature in the general design, is the poorest part of all—nay, quite unworthy of the rest. We allude to the entrance gateway at the south-west angle, or rather what ought to be a gateway, and therefore disappoints when, on being approached, it is found to be a mere arched opening through a wall, instead of a gate-house forming a covered passage. In one sense of the term it may be called scenic, for it smacks strongly of the theatre, being like a paste-board arch upon the stage; nor is this its only defect, as besides having a flimsy lock, it is otherwise poor in design and rather insignificant in appearance. Fortunately, the mistake is one that easily admits of correction, little more being required to be done than now to add a gate-house to the gateway; and were it to be one of considerable depth, it might be attended with the further good effect of somewhat screening and breaking the now too blank-looking lower part of the end of the Hall, beneath the great south window.

After this brief interruption of it, we may resume our tone of commendation, though we cannot stop to particularize the various merits of the exterior, but conduct our readers within the building. We say conduct: because, instead of rushing at once into the Hall, we wish to lead them into it by that line of approach which presents a striking and well-combined succession of architectural parts, all increasing in importance, and terminating in an impressive climax. There are two entrances to the building from the terrace on the east side; which, however, do not communicate with the ground or terrace floor, but lead immediately to the upper one by means of broad flights of steps; consequently no internal staircase is required, that is, no principal or state staircase; for others there are of course, and one of them will come [illegible]ice presently. Taking the northernmost of [illegible] entrances, or that appropriated for the [illegible] after passing through a handsome porch, [illegible]e up a vestibule or short corridor, which [illegible] next the Library) of an inner vestibule or central hall, which connects the other chief apartments with the great dining-hall. This part of the interior is striking, far more so than it would be were it entered immediately from the porch, or were it so placed as to be in a line with that and the first vestibule. It does not disclose itself to view until actually entered, when it bursts upon the eye with brilliant effect, at the same time that it is sufficiently spacious for its purpose (being 22 feet by 58). There is no pretence or obtrusiveness about it, as is too frequently the case in the entrance-halls of large buildings; yet although for the greater part sober in character, it is not a little piquant in arrangement, and in the combined result of plan and section. The first of these is laid out in three divisions, the middle one of which is a square (of 22 feet), divided from the north and south ends by three open arches on pillars; and the angles of this square compartment of the plan are cut off by four other arches, converting it into an octagon; over which is carried up a clerestory lantern of the same form and diameter, having a window ornamented with painted glass on each of its sides. The combination and transition of forms, and the effect of the stream of light from above, tinging with flickering hues the pale walls and pillars, render this a singularly pleasing architectural picture. The ribs of the vaulting of the octagon are partly relieved by gilding, and have gilded bosses at their intersections. The lower part, however, is by no means so satisfactory as the upper, the pillars and arches being somewhat tame in character, and reminiscent of "James Wyatt" Gothic. One novelty, which must not pass unnoticed, is, that in the ceiling, the soffits of the spandrel spaces cut off by the octagon are left open as triangular sky-lights, consisting of a single plate of glass, in order to throw down light directly upon corresponding spaces in the floor, which are paved with thick glass slabs, and thereby serve in turn to admit light into the vestibule beneath, on the lower floor; and to their answering that purpose we can speak with some confidence, for we found that lower vestibule, which would else be nearly dark, better lighted than is usual with places of the kind. Well satisfied as we are, upon the whole, with the principal vestibule, we think it would have been an improvement had the octagon form been defined upon the floor beneath the lantern, by a border of a different colour from the rest of the pavement (which is entirely white), between the pillars. We conceive, too, that it would have been a further improvement if, of the three open arches from either end, the two narrower side ones had been closed up below to the height of between five and six feet by open-work screens; whereby that central division of the plan would have been in a manner marked out as being en suite with the drawing-room, on the west side of it, and the council-room on the opposite one. While the passage across from the one to the other would thus have been less exposed, that from end to end, and the vista from the Library to the Great Hall would have been just the same; and instead of seeming at all to confine or interrupt space, low screens of the kind suggested would have tended to fill up what now strikes too much as blankness in the lower part of the walls. Few architects seem to understand or care for the effect to be produced by partial concealment, or to agree with the poet, that "half the art is skilfully to hide." At the south-west angle of this vestibule is an open recess or bay, lighted by a lofty handsome window, and forming the upper part of a staircase to the lower floor, which is carried down between a massive and solid square newel. This newel forms a pedestal to the parapet of the staircase, which is also solid; and the hand-rail is cut out of the wall with a deep and boldly moulded hollow. The whole of this staircase bay is in excellent taste—perfectly simple and charmingly effective. Few, however, will linger to examine it, but eagerly pass on into the Great Hall—lucky if their eagerness does not trip them up, by causing them to overlook a very awkward step at the entrance to it.

(a) Mr. Pugin has not failed to hurl his bolt at this specimen of bastard perpendicular Gothic, calling it by way of derision "the modern square style," by giving an elevation of Inner Temple Hall; &c. in his last work, which looks even worse, if possible, on paper than in stone.—ED. LAW T.

The folding doors from the vestibule open upon the dais at the north end of the hall; and the coup d'œil which here presents itself may challenge that afforded by any other apartment of the kind, although, in its dimensions, this noble banqueting-room falls short of the one at Christ's Hospital. It is in every other respect greatly its superior,—very much so both in actual loftiness and in loftiness of proportion. In spaciousness, it rather exceeds the largest of the collegiate halls at the Universities; and though it cannot boast of the same extent as to length, it altogether eclipses St. George's Hall, in Windsor Castle, which, to say the truth, answers more to the character of a gallery than a hall, and is besides neither in the most correct taste nor of the most dignified character. The noble oak timber roof, designed on the principle of that at Westminster Hall, gives to this new hall of Lincoln's Inn an air of magnificence that is well kept up in other respects, and to which the windows conduce in no small degree. There are five windows on each side, exclusive of that in the oriel or bay at each end of the dais, and of the large window at the south end, above the screen and gallery over it; and in their upper half, all these windows consist almost entirely of stained glass, displaying various armorial bearings and similar devices. The pendants, and some other parts of the roof, are also emblazoned or picked out in colours and gilding; which being the . we think that some decoration of the kind, however subdued in degree, ought to have been extended to the screen and gallery. The front of this last is, to us, the most questionable, not to say most unsatisfactory feature of all. In style, it hardly seems of a-piece with the rest; and the low and wide open arches into which it is divided shew, to our eyes, little better than so many vacant gaps—too much like a row of boxes in a theatre.

The passage behind the screen, whose openings are filled with plate glass, forms the common entrance into the hall from the south porch on the east side of the building; at the other end of this passage is the staircase leading from the kitchen. Although not belonging to the "show" apartments of the edifice, this last is worth being visited, it being a spacious vaulted room, whose ceiling is supported on massive pillars and bold arches, after the manner of a crypt; and it is about twenty feet in height, it being carried from the basement through the terrace-floor story. Hardly need we say that it is fitted up with every imaginable convenience, and with every improvement in culinary apparatus. Yet, as if this were no sufficient, there is another kitchen on the terrace floor, at the other end of the building, adjoining th sub-vestibule, which, we suppose, is to be devoted t the preparation of the more recherché dishes for th tables on the dais.

As yet, we have mentioned the Drawing-room an Council-room only en passant; nor can we now sa much, since they offer so very little for descriptio that we have only to express our admiration of the for their noble proportions and dignified simplicity and for that sort of charm which, however it may b felt, can hardly be expressed in words. Yet one circumstance there is which deserves to be noted, viz that the ceilings, which are ribbed and panelled, a of deal, unpainted but stained, and then varnished, s as to rival, in depth of tone and beauty of appearanc many of the richest woods. Both these rooms ar now not only finished, but furnished. The Library, on the contrary, is as yet only in a state of progress, and by no means so far advanced as to enable us t judge of it satisfactorily. In its dimensions, it wil rtainly be a very noble apartment, 80 feet in lengt from east to west, by 40 in breadth, and 35 high. Th breadth will be contracted on the floor to about feet, the book-cases being brought out at right angle to the walls, so as to form seven recesses on eac side, thus converting the room into a gallery 80 fee by 18 in the clear, terminating at each extremity in lofty oriel of the same width, and forming three side of an octagon. These two oriels are of admirable de sign; their enriched soffits, pillar-shafts, and mould ngs, all in superior style, and the windows them selves magnificent. The pattern of the glazing in th ower part of the windows, which are filled in with small circular panes, is of pleasing effect, and th glass being slightly embossed or moulded, a sort o flickering brilliancy is produced that is exceedingl agreeable to the eye, partaking, as it does, rather o soberness rather than of garishness.

Having extended our remarks to such length, w shall only add, that this new structure is entitled t our astonishment as well as our admiration, for the first stone of it was laid no longer ago than Apri 1843. The whole of it has risen up in little more than two years, just about the time which it has taken to erect the row of dwelling-houses which is to be one of the wings of the British Museum, and put up a few columns that are to form the façade of that national edifice!

NECROLOGY.

SIR WILLIAM FOLLETT.

A GREAT light of our legal firmament has unhappily gone out, and the event seems to impose upon us the duty of recording its splendour, and tracing its course while it continued to shine forth.

Sir William Follett was among the most able and most successful members of the profession; and he united, with an extraordinary capacity for its prosecution, talents of a very high order as a senator;—talents rarely found in combination with those of the lawyer, how closely soever the two provinces may, to superficial observers, appear to touch. In truth, if there is much to qualify an able and popular advocate for parliamentary exertion, there is also much to disable him. The niceties of legal arguments are not very level to the comprehension of the multitude, either within or without the walls of the senate, and the subtle argumentation in which lawyers are prone to indulge is therefore very little suited to the popular taste. An advocate, too, representing his client is apt to be somewhat careless how sorely he fatigues the judge, in urging all points that may, by any possibility, serve his cause. Even when he addresses a jury, he makes sure of their attention, for they have no choice, because they are sworn to determine, and must therefore hear; besides that, only coming now and then into the box, they are much more patient than men who are doomed daily to hear debate. He is also a good deal above his audience in understanding, generally their superior in station,—and thus it happens that the advocate, always secure of a hearing, takes little pains to gain attention, nor at all dreads losing it by his prolixity. Add to this that he generally enters the House of Commons after his station is established in Westminster Hall, and he is not disposed to court favour in order to set his new position on a line with that which he has already attained. All these considerations tend to make lawyers somewhat careless both of being interesting and of being brief, when they address the House; and all of these considerations are apt to make them abandon the attempt at rising there, in some disgust at finding themselves undervalued or overlooked. These astute personages find the meed of popular applause vain and idle, and run back to the chase of surer game, among their natural prey. The failure of lawyers in Parliament is thus not difficult to account for. But nothing can surpass the gross ignorance of some who on the present occasion have handled this subject. It has actually been said by some one of a class manifestly wholly unacquainted with both the Bar and the Senate, that only two exceptions have been known of men succeeding in Parliament after establishing their reputation at the bar; as if Sir Samuel Romilly were no lawyer; as if Lord Lyndhurst and Lord Brougham had never been known as leaders of the bar; as if Lord Plunket had not held the very first place in both courts and parliaments; as if Lord Denman had failed either in the one scene or the other. The list might be lengthened by going back to the Dunnings, the Thurlows, the Leeds, the Wedderburns, the Floods, the Murrays; but the thoughtless writers we allude to, of course are still more ignorant of the times before their own, than of the most universally known facts of the present day. We, however, admit the general rule to be the other way, and that Sir William Follett is to be mentioned only as augmenting by one remarkable instance the considerable number of the exceptions. This is calculated to lend his history an additional interest, an interest not confined to the circle of professional men.

He was the son of Captain Follett, by Miss Webb, an Irish lady of Kinsale. In 1790, the health of this gallant officer having been broken by serving in the West Indies, he left the army, and engaged in mercantile pursuits in Devonshire, where he lived, and where he died in his seventy-first year. William was then the eldest surviving son, having been born the 2nd December, 1798, at Topsham. His elder brother, a lieutenant in the 43rd regiment, was killed before San Sebastian, in September, 1813, on the very day after he landed in Spain.

William, contrary to the positive but most gratuitous assertion of other periodical writers, had no constitutional weakness in early life, and no want of the very earliest indications of great talents. His own family had formed the highest opinion of his capacity, and in consequence educated him for the bar. He was first sent to the Exeter Grammar School, then under Dr. Lempriere, author of the well-known classical dictionary; and he was afterwards placed under the private tuition of Mr. Hutchinson, curate of Heavitree, near the same city. In 1814 he went to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he remained till 1818, when he took his bachelor's degree, but he took it with no academical honours, nor did the sciences chiefly cultivated there ever prove attractive to him; though he was sufficiently conversant with classical literature, and his general reading was extensive. It has been said by the same inaccurate dealers in ephemeral history, that at Cambridge he was a Whig. This rests upon insufficient authority, at least it is coupled with a very gross mis-statement,—for the writer says that on meeting a college friend soon after he entered Parliament, he said, in answer to a charge of having changed his principles, that his conversion was at least disinterested, the Whigs being then in the zenith of power and popularity. Now, here is an anachronism of some years, for he entered Parliament in 1835, when the Whigs were in opposition, and he entered it as Solicitor-General. He had three years before contested Exeter on Tory principles, and failed; and the fact is certain that from the moment of his coming to London in 1818 he was, and continued steadily to be, a Tory or Conservative; all his friendships, and most of his connections, being with that party. Another equally groundless mis-statement accompanies the same assertion: it is said to be well known that vertures were made to him by the Whig government, and rejected. We affirm upon the most unquestionable authority, that for this there is not the least foundation. We state this as well upon the express authority of the Whig ministers as upon that of Sir William Follett's family, and his most intimate friends. The Chancellor (Lord Brougham) offered him a silk gown in 1831, having known him intimately at the bar, and formed very early a high estimate of his talents; but the offer was expressly made upon the footing of his being a political adversary, and certain to take an active and powerful position against the government of his lordship's friends in the House of Commons. The refusal of professional rank was made after full deliberation, both in conference with the Chancellor and with Sir William's near connection and attached friend Mr. Croker, and it was refused solely upon the ground of professional prudence.

In 1818 he became a pupil of Mr. Godfrey Sykes, and afterwards of Mr. Robert Bayly, then eminent special pleaders, having been two years before entered of the Inner Temple, and after very diligent and successful study for three years under these learned men, he began himself to practise as a pleader below the bar, and obtained a fair share of business. In the summer of 1824 he was called to the bar, and the year after joined the Western Circuit, to which also his master, Mr. Bayly, belonged. He was now in his twenty-seventh year, and it may safely be affirmed that very few men have ever entered the profession with more abundant qualifications for rapidly and greatly succeeding in its arduous rivalry. His understanding was naturally penetrating, and it was solid, so that with extraordinary quickness of perception he had a sound and mature judgment, never at fault. At the happy age, especially, when all the active powers are in full vigour, and lend force and quickness to the intellectual faculties, other men may be found of equal acuteness, of equal subtlety, of equally rapid apprehension, but in combination with such sure and accurate judgment, that capacity has rarely if ever been found. As genius is of universal application, we must suppose that had the accidents of position or of taste directed his studies to the severer sciences, his successful prosecution of those studies would have been as remarkable. But still his legal studies had never suffered any such interruption, and as the law is a jealous mistress, nor easily pardons even any passing infidelity, never any divided affection, it was among the favourable circumstances in which he entered the forum, that his mind had been wholly given to jurisprudence, and was entirely filled with the solid fruits of many years' study. Accordingly his rise was rapid. The very first time that he addressed the Court of King's Bench, every one who heard him was struck with the excellence of his argument, both in the matter and in the manner, nor entertained the least doubt that the greatest success was his certain portion: his confidence too was unhesitating, unfaltering, because it was founded on a ground which he felt to be solid: but his outward manner made no unbecoming disclosure of this feeling, and was firm, without being presumptuous. But his entire confidence in his own opinion was not even at his first entrance upon the duties of the profession to be shaken by the contrary decision of the judges themselves, and some who sat next him in court, when they determined in opposition to his first argument, well remember his saying in an audible whisper, addressed to himself, "They are going to decide quite wrong—as wrong as it is possible for men to decide." This made full as great an impression on those who heard or rather overheard it, as the able argument itself which he had just delivered. The judges whom he thus judged were not inferior men; they were the very first in the profession.—Abbott, Bayley, Holroyd, and Littledale. The friend, as he afterwards became, who heard him, said, "that whether he or the Court was right, he would ensure Follett a thousand a-year." This anecdote Sir W. Follett was fond of repeating.

The rapid success of one so singularly gifted, and devoting himself so exclusively to his profession, was little to be wondered at, but to all admirers of talent was greatly to be rejoiced in; for, as there is nothing so painful to the generous mind as the sight occasionally exhibited of merit deprived, by accident, of its just distinction, and men of known capacity pining in obscurity, so is there no spectacle more pleasing to contemplate than that of genius reaping without any delay, almost without a struggle, its appropriate reward. To say that Sir William Follett presented himself at the first as fully fitted for his professional duties as he ever after appeared, might perhaps savour of exaggerated admiration; and he certainly derived from practice the improvement which it must always afford, and most to those who from natural ability may seem the least to need it. Yet no one can doubt that in this, as in some other respects, he strongly resembled Mr. Pitt, for there was greater maturity displayed, both of faculties, of acquirements, of legal habits, almost of an advocate's habits, in the young lawyer on his very first appearance, than had ever before been seen in Westminster Hall; as the statesman is well known to have started into public life at a still earlier age, an accomplished orator, whose after-exhibitions could hardly be said to have surpassed his first display. There is, indeed, this marked diversity between the two cases,—that Follett was an accomplished jurisconsult as well as a highly-gifted speaker, and accomplished from the beginning; while Pitt's rhetoric so far exceeded his statesmanship from first to last, that it left the latter far behind during all his long life of power nearly uncontrolled.

The practice of Sir William Follett soon became very extensive, both in London and on the circuit. (a) He was the favourite junior in all causes, whether important or trifling. He gave the most entire satisfaction, because the most valuable and unobtrusive assistance to his leaders. His business was not confined to the courts of law, for he was eagerly sought after as counsel in parliamentary committees; and he afforded perhaps the solitary instance of a great Nisi Prius practitioner, and one full of practice in Banc, gaining also an ample income from parliamentary business, without in the least suffering it to interfere with the regular duties of his profession either on circuit or in Westminster Hall. It is well known that they who devote themselves to that most lucrative line of the profession give up the more exalted and thorny for the humbler and more gainful path; and that he who would line his purse by treading in the one, must not aspire to the honours which are only to be approached by the other.

In committees he first became distinguished as a leader before his standing at the bar had placed him in the front rank; and in all probability that committee practice was of service in making his powers of command known; for it is certain that a lawyer may be highly qualified to fill and to shine in the second place, according to the well-known French proverb (b), who would be eclipsed in the first, of which the most eminent pleaders, the Wallaces, the Holroyds, the Richardsons, the Littledales, the Abbotts, afford striking instances.

Sir William Follett, when he became a leader, at once fully answered every expectation that had been formed of him. In the first place he was thoroughly master of his profession; that is, of the principal tools wherewithal he had to work. Then the others he could handle as easily and skilfully, for he had an extraordinary power of speaking with clearness, with perfect self-possession, with abundant energy where energy was required, with a most pleasing tone of voice, that filled the ear, never tired, and perfectly suited the solid matter and the delicate texture of his discourse. Again, he had absolute command over both his temper and his faculties; could make the one submit to his purpose, and use the other at will, in that extraordinary process, without which there is hardly any real and certainly no practical business-like eloquence, the thinking, and reasoning, and refining, and calculating, while going on, and, as it were, on his legs. Thus his attention was ever wide awake, and as if his whole soul were concentrated in each cause, and in each successive step of it. His circumspection was also perfect, and served to provide against all attacks, as against all snares. From his quickness, as well as his entire self-reliance, and his perfect command of himself, he was of singular prudence and discretion, never to be taken off his guard, nor ever hurried into any proceeding of hazard. The faculty so essential to a leader of causes as of armies, a sudden and piercing glance through the adversary's plans, from a rapid view of his movements, the coup d'œil, as it is termed, he possessed, in an eminent degree, like all great advocates who conduct business. If he was not to be over-reached or out-manœuvered by his antagonist, so did that antagonist run no small risk from him. He was a person not to be slumbered near, and also being somewhat apt to press on the vanquished, he was, as Mr. Grattan once said of Lord Clare, though in another sense, "a dangerous man to run away from." The judge, too, required to be as much on his guard as the adverse counsel. No one's arguments in law required to be more closely watched, more especially in his reply, when the judge was left to himself without any comment or explanation of the opposite party; for so extremely skilful, so dexterous was he—so gradually, by such imperceptible steps, did he glide on, insinuating himself rather than moving, that you could not tell he was making any progress, but suffered him by unseen steps to advance, by minute fragments to beg the question, till at last you found yourself entangled in the web so artistically woven and so cunningly thrown around, and had to go back to the part from which the first petitio principii had been made.

Οὐδὲ θεῶν μακάρων· περὶ γὰρ δολόεντα τέτυκτο.(c)

It happened that during Sir William Follett's time no state prosecutions for libel or for treason, nor indeed any other causes célèbres, occurred after he succeeded to the lead. He had not, therefore, any of those comparatively rare opportunities of distinguishing himself before all the world, and his great fame was confined to Westminster Hall until he came into Parliament. It was in 1835 that this important event in his life happened; but far less important to his fame than to that of others, for his reputation being established at the Bar was of a kind that left no man the least room for doubting his great success also in the senate; and it is perhaps the only instance in which this could so certainly be foreseen. He was appointed Solicitor-General during Sir Robert Peel's short administration, and was returned for Exeter by a great majority, having three years before been defeated in contesting that city. No sooner did he take his seat than the expectations of all men were amply fulfilled, and the predictions justified of those who had marked his progress at the Bar. His matter was seen to be pregnant and pertinent; but it is in manner that lawyers are apt to fail before the assembled Commons, and his manner was perfect—calm, yet not cold—firm, but unassuming—perfectly self-possessed, though without the least presumption; every one admitted it to be about the most recommending manner that ever had clothed logical argument, clear statement, and powerful appeal. The voice, too, was of peculiar sweetness, as well as great compass, and it reminded the hearer of Mr. Pitt, to whom indeed in his whole manner he bore a great resemblance. His resemblance in the early maturity of his faculties and his fame has already been pointed out. He was, moreover, an accomplished debater, which many great speakers never were, including certainly Burke, probably Chatham, undoubtedly Windham, and perhaps Romilly also. The reliance which the government or the party he was with reposed on his assistance in every emergency was unbounded, like the confidence of his clients, and it was amply justified. It was a common observation, that he was less indifferent than some others to the gains of the Profession, but never did he leave the least ground of complaint to his parliamentary allies, that he preferred his briefs to his duties in the House of Commons. It is no exaggeration to say that the solidity of his matter, the charms of his manner, and his judicious use of the public ear, "using it as not abusing," made him more certain of a hearing, and more sure to retain it while he pleased, than almost any lawyer who ever addressed the House. Besides, his command over their attention was not confined by any wit that sparkled in his speech, the surest remedy for any popular assembly's flagging spirits, nor yet by any lively imagination of which he poured forth the stores, nor by impassioned or pathetic appeals, nor even by any rare power of vehement declamation; but it was derived from a rare combination of most lucid statement, singular aptness of argument, and of homely illustration, a forcible expression of contempt for the adversary or the argument he was exposing, mingled with a very sparing but not unhappy use of sarcasm, and by a voice of which it would be difficult to speak too highly, whether its smoothness, or its richness, or its sweetness be considered. He took part more rarely and more sparingly than all desired he should, fearful of wearying his audience by frequently appearing before them, and long demanding their attention. He was found quite equal to grappling with the largest as with the most ordinary questions; and though moderately provided with political knowledge, he never was deficient in the supply required by the exigency of the occasion, whether the subject of discussion was foreign or domestic policy, economical and financial science, or the learning of constitutional law; for he had the happy facility possessed by the Nisi Prius advocate, of gaining information for the special emergency—the artist who must make himself acquainted with the machinery of a patent one day, the nature of a chemical process another, the tackle and steerage of a ship a third, that he may explain these matters clearly to a jury as ignorant of them when he begins his lecture as he was himself two days before, and will again be two days after the cause has been tried.

On Sir Robert Peel's second accession to office in 1841 he became again Solicitor-General; and in 1844, on Sir Frederick Pollock being raised to the Exchequer as Chief Baron, he succeeded him as Attorney-General, which office he held till his decease.

As there were no celebrated causes to display his talents at the bar during his time, so were there no cases of very great distinction to make his parliamentary appearance more memorable than their intrinsic merit was calculated to render them. But a mixed case of criminal law and parliamentary exhibition was afforded by the trial of Lord Cardigan, for fighting a duel, and no member of the House of Lords who was present on that occasion will easily forget the immeasurable superiority which, throughout the day's proceeding, he shewed over all his competitors in every branch of the cause.

During the last five or six years of his brilliant career, he was a frequent practitioner in courts of equity, and he shewed a familiar acquaintance with the law of these tribunals, and, above all, with the law of real property, which they so often administer, the most recondite, difficult, and scientific branch of our jurisprudence. It is probable that his frequenting the Court of Chancery was mainly owing to his having the prospect before him of one day succeeding to its chair. No one doubts that had he survived, the Great Seal must have been his portion, and with a more than ordinary assent of the whole Profession over which he would so worthily have been called to preside.

But the decrees of an All-wise Providence forbade. As early as the summer of 1838, symptoms were perceivable of a serious malady having made a lodgment in his constitution, and it was feared that his lungs were affected. In 1841, while attending the Privy Council, he was seized with an attack of erysipelas, which retreated inwards, and alarmingly affected the alimentary canal. He hardly regained good health after that illness. Two years later the spine was supposed to be affected, for he certainly had an extreme feebleness in the lower limbs, almost amounting to paralysis. At length, in 1844, this increased, and seemed complicated with a return of pulmonary weakness. He was obliged to leave off all practice; and on the rising of Parliament to go abroad with the intention of wintering in the south, should his health not be sufficiently restored by the autumnal repose to justify a return in November, the beginning of the judicial year. It was ultimately found necessary to make for Italy before the cold of winter approached, and he went to Rome and Naples, which he did not quit before February. His attached friend Lord Brougham had hopes of his benefiting by the delightful and agreeable climate of Provence, and for some weeks expected him at Cannes, where he had urged him to occupy his villa. He went however by sea to Marseilles, and (a) The best test of his success was the rapid annual increase of his fees: they amounted, as we have heard it confidently stated, to 300 guineas in the first year; and in the fourth year they reached nearly 3,000. This was a success, we conceive, wholly without example in the Profession.

after passing a few days at Paris, returned to England early in March. The proverbial deceitfulness of consumption, which soon after plainly declared itself, flattered his friends with hope that the blow might be stayed, if not averted, with which they were now threatened. But he felt unequal to any business except that of consultations, and giving opinions, nor could he attend Parliament, except on two or three occasions, on one of which he spoke, and with his accustomed power and felicity. In the month of May, however, finding his illness increase, he distinctly tendered the resignation of his office of attorney-general, which, however, was not accepted.

For better air he removed from his house in Park-street to the house of a kinsman in the Regent's-park. The disease now made rapid progress; but his mind remained unclouded within a few hours of his decease, which took place at three o'clock in the afternoon of Saturday, the 28th of June, 1845. How far the consumption which proximately caused his death was itself the result of another malady it is not easy with certainty to determine. But certainly, although the chest was in 1838 the seat of illness, a tendency to palsy was perceived long before the pulmonary complaint which proved fatal had appeared. That he suffered from severe labour has frequently been said, but without any foundation. The mischief was seated far deeper than any devotedness to hard work could reach, or any relaxation from hard work could cure. In truth, no man ever went through his labour of any kind, whether in chambers or in court, with greater ease to himself. That labour never fatigued his understanding or damped his spirits, and his body suffered accordingly no wear and tear from the work which could only affect it through the mind.

He had married in 1830 the eldest daughter of the late Sir Harding Giffard, Chief Justice of Ceylon, by whom has left two daughters and four sons, the youngest only thirteen months old.

His death in the zenith of his fame, the fulness of prosperity, the certain prospect of the highest public station under the crown which the country knows, the unimpaired vigour of his great faculties, the possession of universal esteem, such as no successful lawyer but Lord Erskine ever before possessed, an esteem that seemed to lay all envious feelings asleep, as if where there was no rivalry there could be no jealousy, was calculated to produce a great effect upon the minds of all; it was regarded as a singularly affecting spectacle, one which exhibited in a striking way the vanity of sublunary enjoyments, of mortal powers and worldly prospects—it was deeply felt as a public and above all as a professional loss. The funeral was rendered still more solemn by the spontaneous attendance of the heads of the law, the ministers of state, many distinguished members of both Houses of Parliament, and the most eminent members of the Bar. The Chancellor, the Prime Minister, the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, were among those who bore the pall. The funeral service was rendered impressive by all these extrinsic circumstances, and it was only lamented that its singular and touching beauty should have been in a great degree sacrificed to the music—admirable music it is true, but a most inadequate substitution for the noble and mournful simplicity of the service, as it is read, and ought ever so to be. A subscription has been formed for erecting a statue to his memory.

In relating the history of this eminent person's life the best description of his character has been presented to the reader. It remains only to say that he was peculiarly amiable in all the relations of domestic and of private life. To this the sweetness of his equable temper, and the known purity, as well as firmness, of his principles contributed, with a certainty and a power that must needs have produced their natural effect. His genius having always been directed towards law, and law alone, his general ... formation was not extensive, and he disappointed all who expected from his conversation the same pleasure that they derived from his public exhibitions. But he loved the relaxation of society, and took his part with sense, and intelligence, and uniform good-humour, though all desired it should be a larger share. His composition was clear and pure, though he had only the habits of writing acquired by professional correspondence or opinions. Though law was the study of his life, he was well versed in classical literature, and retained to the last his relish for its study. Indeed, his taste in speaking was pure enough to shew that he drew his principles of oratory from the only pure sources. In Italy he enjoyed the pleasure of such associations as much as the state of his enfeebled health would allow. That he was a competent Greek scholar has been doubted from the occurrence at Guildhall of a book being mentioned with the name of Αγωγος (leader), for the author, and his not remarking the meaning till the Chief Justice said—"You, Sir William, are meant, among others." But we happen to know that within a few weeks of his decease, a dispute arising upon a Greek passage, and the sense of a particular idiom, he differed firmly with the company, and on examination was found to be right. This leaves no doubt on the point; but other proofs exist.

In his conduct as a professional man there have been attempts made by the uninformed, or the prejudiced, to point out one flaw; he is sometimes charged with having disappointed clients by taking briefs while he could not attend to the business. No accusation can be more unfair, and it is not the less to be repelled and reproved because it is made against every man in full practice—we might almost say unavoidably made, as well as infallibly groundless. The first practitioners are always beset with applications from clients for their assistance. They cannot possibly tell whether on any occasion they shall be able to attend the court unless they confine themselves to a single court, which no great leader can do, and which the business of such occasional courts as the Lords and the Privy Council, having no Bar of their own, would never permit. Consequently, clients must run the risk in question; but as they run it with their eyes open, they have no right to blame the advocate when the chance which they were aware of has deprived them of his aid. It was once said by Bearcroft, when much employed in committees, and seen walking about in the court of requests, unmoved by the many calls of his name in all quarters, that he was there to avoid giving undue preference to any of his clients. But a man whose conduct in other respects was so bad deserves not to be cited as an example. Sir W. Follett did only what all leaders do; his clients suffered only as all clients do that insist upon retaining a man of whose services they cannot be assured. The answer to their complaints is—"Go to inferior counsel, of whose attendance you can be assured." But this they never will do; and for why? Because every one feels that if he does not take the only effectual means of securing Sir W. Follett, his adversary will retain him, and then, peradventure, he may appear against him. Therefore every one takes the chance of having him, with the risk of losing him, in order to insure himself against the risk of having to meet him on the opposite side. Nothing can be more plain than this. Many instances might be given during Sir W. Follett's greatest popularity, of clients insisting upon delivering briefs, though formally and distinctly told that he could not attend. Why did they so? Because some unforeseen accident might intervene to make his attendance possible; at all events to prevent his being retained by the other side.

Undoubtedly, a person with so many engagements must occasionally have found himself unable to perform some of them; but we know that when such an event unfortunately occurred, no party concerned was more distressed at it than himself. While preparing this article, we have been told of a case by a most respectable solicitor in which he had specially retained Sir William to conduct an important cause for him at the assizes. When the time arrived he was prevented by a family affliction from attending; but not only did he attend at a subsequent assize without a second fee, which was quite a matter of course, but he pressed upon his client, who had been vexatiously made to pay the costs of the day, the full amount thus paid, amounting to 400*l.*, which the client as peremptorily refused to accept. A fact like this is worth a thousand surmises, and puts them all to flight; but we may confidently add our belief, that the items of fees returned or refused, from kindness and other voluntary motives, would be found to form a much larger head in his books than persons unacquainted with such matters would readily imagine. In one half-year, we believe, he returned 800*l.* and in the course of a few years, 4,000*l.*

JOURNAL OF PROPERTY.

Sale of Railway Shares in Companies not completely Registered.—It has been a question much debated amongst respectable stockbrokers, and others deeply interested in railway stock, whether the sale of shares represented by letters of allotment, bankers' receipts, or scrip, in companies only provisionally registered, is or is not legal, under the new Joint Stock Companies Act, which came into operation on the 1st of November last. It is very much to the credit of the Manchester Stock Exchange, which, as a body, we believe, stands high for the careful conduct of its business, that they should have taken the best possible course to set this question at rest. Through their solicitors, Messrs. Sale and Worthington, the Manchester Stock Exchange prepared a case for legal opinion, and we have been favoured by these gentlemen with a copy of the queries, and of the answers thereto, given by the authorities consulted. When we state that these authorities are amongst the leading counsel at the English bar—namely, Sir Frederick Thesiger, the attorney-general; Mr. Ogle, of the Western, and Mr. Cowling, of the Northern Circuit—we need say no more to recommend their deliberate opinions (for we understand that the Attorney-General had the case before him some time, for the express purpose of giving it his most careful consideration) to the serious attention of all connected with railways, and especially to the boards of provisional directors of companies established since the 1st of November last. The following is a copy of the case:—

"1st. Whether as to the companies established before the 1st of November last, and therefore not within the provisions of the new Act (7 & 8 Vict. c. 110), the sale of letters of allotment, bankers' receipts, or scrip, or any of them, is legal?

"We are of opinion that sales of letters of allotment, bankers' receipts, and scrip, issued by companies established before the 1st of November last, are not within the provisions of the stat. 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110, and that, consequently, the sales of such documents are legal.

"2nd. Whether railway companies are within the restrictions as to sale or transfer of shares, or other restrictive clauses of the above Act; and if so, whether, after provisional registration, and before complete registration, the sale of letters of allotment, bankers' receipts, or scrip, is legal, or illegal?

"We are of opinion that railway companies, established after the 1st of November last, are within the restrictions contained in the 26th section of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110, and we think that sales of letters of allotment, bankers' receipts, and scrip, attempted to be made after the provisional, but before the complete registration of the company, are illegal.

"3rd. Whether, after complete registration, but before obtaining an Act of Parliament, the sale of such scrip (as scrip will then have been issued, and then of scrip only) is legal or illegal?

"We are of opinion that sales, after complete registration of scrip, issued by railway companies established subsequently to the 1st of November last, are legal. It is evident from the latter portion of the 25th section, that the legislature intended that railway companies, on complete registration, and before the act of incorporation, or other Act giving authority for executing the works, should have all those powers conferred by the first part of the section, which are most qualified or retained by the latter part; and we do not find any thing either in that, or in the preceding section, from which it is to be collected that the legislature intended to render illegal sales of scrip by such companies, until their acts of incorporation should be obtained.

"4th. If the sale of scrip, after complete registration, be legal, whether it is not the duty of the provisional directors to lodge the subscription contracts, and other requisite documents, at the registry office, so as to obtain a certificate of complete registration, and thus enable scripholders to sell scrip?

"We consider it to be the duty of the provisional directors to lodge the subscription contracts, and other requisite documents, at the office, for the purpose of obtaining a certificate of complete registration.

"5th. If the restrictive clauses of the Act do not apply to railway companies, whether the sale of letters of allotment, bankers' receipts, or scrip, be or be not illegal, notwithstanding they are so excluded?

"Being of opinion that the restrictive clauses of 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110, apply to railway companies formed after the 1st of November last, it only remains for us to observe, that as to companies established before the 1st of November, we do not think, independently of the statute, that the sale of letters of allotment, bankers' receipts, or scrip, would be legal.

Stock-jobbing in Paris.—For some days past all Paris has been deafened with a noise of shares; on all sides one hears but these phrases, "Have you any shares in the northern railroads?" "How many shares has Rothschild sent you?" "I have applied, but have yet received no reply." "He has been most gracious to me; he has sent me some without my asking for them." "He has not treated me so well; I have written for 100, and he has sent me but 10." "I have no reason to complain; I have had 25 out of those he sent to my journal." "I have been less fortunate; our editor has kept all to himself, and I have great pains to get four out of the 200 he has received." "The Court people, peers, and deputies are crammed with them." "I know that well enough; the Duke Pasquier has had 300, the Duke Decazes 400; but this is nothing to Count de Montalivet, who has obtained 500." All this is certain, or it is at least certain that it is said openly and everywhere. M. Rothschild has, for a fortnight past, distributed his favours with a generosity our modern financiers had not accustomed us to. He showers the manna of his shares on the Luxembourg and Institute, the Palais-Bourbon, and the Tuileries; the newspaper offices have, above all, been inundated with them; but only the ministerial and dynastic prints of all shades. Very laughable comedies have been played in all this affair, with which it would be scarcely possible to find any thing to be compared in the scandalous doings of the Rue Quincampoix, in Law's days. Among the very curious things that have just taken place we shall mention the unheard-of fact of a well-known individual, who, having received 200 shares from M. Rothschild, has proudly returned them. If he were named, nobody would believe it, but everybody would most surely exclaim, "Où diable la délicatesse va telle se nicher?"—Quotidienne.

THE REPORTS.

Equity Courts.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S COURT.

April 15 and 18.

LEWIS v. LORD TANKERVILLE.

Practice—Transfer of cause in which costs had been reserved.

A motion had been made in this cause before Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce, upon which his Honour made an order that the motion should stand over, with liberty for the party to apply to the Lord Chancellor to hear the motion; and that if such an application should not be made, or be refused, the motion to stand dismissed, reserving the costs. In this state of the cause the motion and cause had been transferred to the court of the Vice-Chancellor of England, there being in that court two other causes between the same parties, involving the same question.

James Russell and Craig, for the defendant, objected that this would in effect be an appeal from one of the Vice-Chancellors to another, which is contrary to the practice of the Court.

Follett, for the plaintiff.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—I might hear the motion, and dispose of the costs; and if I direct a transfer of the cause to the Vice-Chancellor of England's Court, I can make it a part of the order that the Vice-Chancellor of England may dispose of the costs reserved.

Craig insisted that the party who had failed in his application before Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce, which was now admitted to be irregular, ought to pay the costs of that motion.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—Let the Vice-Chancellor of England decide the question of costs, which has been reserved on that motion, and his decision in point of form shall be ratified by me.

May 1 and July 31.

WOOD v. ROWCLIFFE.

Misdescription of plaintiff—Security for costs—Practice—Amendment of bill.

Where a person, resident abroad, comes to this country for the purpose of filing a bill in Chancery, and describes himself as of the temporary residence he has here, that is not a proper description of his residence, which is in fact abroad, and he will be compelled to give security for costs.

But when, after such an erroneous description, the plaintiff comes to reside in England, and in an amended bill still continues that erroneous description upon the advice of his solicitor, that it is proper to retain the description contained in the original bill, that will not subject the plaintiff to liability to give security for costs, at the instance of a new defendant, introduced by the amendment, on the ground of wilful misdescription.

Query, whether a plaintiff, having changed his residence since the filing of the original bill, ought in his amended bill to adhere to the original description?

This was an appeal from the decision of Vice-Chancellor Wigram upon an application made on the part of the defendant, that the plaintiff's bill should stand dismissed for not having given security for costs. That application had been refused. The circumstances were these. The plaintiff Wood, who had been residing with his family at Boulogne, came over to this country for the purpose of instituting this suit, and remained in London about a fortnight, during which time he resided with a friend lodging in Great Carter-lane. In the bill, the plaintiff was described as of No. 1, Great Carter-lane. The original bill was filed in November 1843, against the defendant Rowcliffe, and it was amended in November 1844, when Buchanan was also made a defendant. In the amended bill, the plaintiff's place of residence was still described as "Great Carter-lane." In December, 1843, the defendant Rowcliffe had obtained an order that the plaintiff should give security for costs, on the ground that he was in fact resident abroad. On the 19th of December 1844, the defendant Buchanan also moved the Court that the plaintiff should be ordered to give security for costs upon the ground that he was misdescribed in the mended bill. In a support of the application, it was sworn that a person had called at every house in Great Carter-lane to inquire for the plaintiff, and was told that he did not reside there. At No. 1, the landlady said he had slept there for a few nights, about a year previously, with a Mr. ——, who was then her lodger, and that both of them had left one morning early to go to a railway station, and had not been there since. An order that the plaintiff should give security for costs having been made on Rowcliff's application, it was served on his solicitor, but no security had been given. On the 11th of January, 1845, a motion was made by the defendants that the bill should be dismissed, because the order directing security for costs had not been complied with. Upon the hearing of that motion, the plaintiff's counsel stated that he had long been resident in England, and that if his actual residence at the time of the amendment ought to have been stated, it was an omission from a mere mistake of the practice. The Vice-Chancellor then ordered the motion to stand over; and in the following Term the plaintiff moved that the order of the 19th of December, 1844, requiring him to give security for costs, should be discharged, and the two motions came on together. The plaintiff stated that he had been resident in England since the 14th of February, 1844. The plaintiff also stated the various places in England, and the different lodgings and hotels at which he had lived since that time, and that he was then permanently settled at Churton-street, Blackfriars.

Romilly, for the plaintiff.

Kenyon Parker and H. Clarke, for the defendant.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—What is the consequence if, after order that a plaintiff resident abroad should give security for costs, he afterwards come over and reside here?

K. Parker.—The order is not discharged.

Romilly.—The plaintiff finding it necessary, trustee, to file the bill, came over and lodged in Great Carter-lane, and was properly then described as of that place. When the bill was amended, the plaintiff said to his then solicitor, Mr. Nias, "I am not now living at Great Carter-lane, but at Churton-street;" to which Nias replied, that the plaintiff having been described as of Great Carter-lane in the original bill, he must be so described in the amended bill. Upon this, the Vice-Chancellor said the misdescription was a mere error of the solicitor, and that under such circumstances the order for security for costs should not have been made nor should the bill be dismissed; and he directed that the plaintiff should pay the costs of setting the matter right, and that the defendant should have six weeks' time to answer the amended bill.

K. Parker contended that the original bill contained a misdescription of the plaintiff's residence, and cited Sandys v. Long (2 Myl. & K. 487).

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—I do not consider that the plaintiff's description of his residence in the original bill was a misdescription; but that the residence in Great Carter-lane was not such a residence within the jurisdiction as is required by the practice of the Court, and that, in fact, he was resident abroad. Then he explains the way in which the mistake in the description of his residence in the amended bill was made, and that, in fact, he was then resident in Churton-street. He has given his successive residences in England, and the periods during which he lived at each place. Supposing that statement to be true, it appears to be a satisfactory explanation. Now let us see whether it is true.

K. Parker.—The plaintiff was at hide and seek. The defendant's solicitor had written to Mr. Nias, the late solicitor of the plaintiff, who, in reply, had said that the plaintiff had usually kept him (Nias) in the dark as to his residence. Nias also denied in that correspondence that he had made any such statement as to the necessity of continuing the description of the residence as in the original bill, to which the plaintiff had deposed. Mr. Nias had, however, refused to make an affidavit to that effect, alleging that he did not think it proper to do so against his late client.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—The affidavit you have read sets out the information received from Mr. Nias, but the deponent does not say that he believes it to be true. I see, however, this is a case of suspicion; that the Court should call upon Mr. Nias to make an affidavit. Altogether, there is so much of suspicion in the case, that I think I ought to hear what Mr. Nias has to say. I shall reserve the costs. The Vice-Chancellor has acted upon the reason assigned by the plaintiff why he was misdescribed; now I have reason to suspect that the fact upon which the Vice-Chancellor proceeded was mis-stated. If Mr. Nias makes an affidavit, I shall attend to it.

On a subsequent day it was stated that Mr. Nias still declined to make an affidavit, and his lordship said, that the plaintiff's explanation was then uncontradicted.

Thursday, July 31.—On the case being again mentioned, the LORD CHANCELLOR said—I thought I had disposed of the whole case. The question is, whether there is any intentional misrepresentation by the plaintiff of his place of residence; and his explanation is contradicted by no affidavit. Mr. Nias has refused to make an affidavit.

K. Parker and Clarke, for the defendant, contended that even if the plaintiff's affidavit of his residences in England must be taken as true, he was keeping himself out of sight in consequence of embarrassments; and they compared it to the case of a commercial traveller and a pedlar, who had been made to give security for costs by the Court of Exchequer. (2 Younge & Col. 217.)

Romilly, for the plaintiff, did not deny that the plaintiff had been flitting about, and that he had been in distress. He had been a bankrupt, but had since obtained his certificate. It is not the practice to alter the plaintiff's description on amending the bill.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—It is clear Mr. Nias knew that the plaintiff did not reside in Great Carter-lane, and that an order that he should give security for costs as to one of the defendants had been made in consequence of his description in the original bill being incorrect. Yet it is said that it was still his duty to adhere to that erroneous description in his amended bill. In the amended bill the plaintiff might be correctly described, adding, "in the original bill, described as of so and so."

Romilly.—The Vice-Chancellor did not decide this point, which is one of great nicety.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—The whole ground of the motion was on wilful misrepresentation by the plaintiff; and it is not necessary to go into the practice, for the plaintiff has not made an intentional mistake. He was told by his solicitor that he was bound to adhere to the original mistake.

K. Parker.—The new defendant, made so by the original bill, had a right to ascertain the plaintiff's residence. As to the new defendant, the misdescription in the amended bill was plainly wilful.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—It is not a wilful misdescription, so far as the new defendant is concerned. The plaintiff resides now within the jurisdiction, and in his affidavit he states that he has also brought his family to England. There is nothing to shew that he intends to go back to France. I think there is no ground for supposing he had wilfully misdescribed his residence. Mr. Nias has refused to make an affidavit to contradict the plaintiff's statement, and it is not necessary to follow up the inquiry whether that conversation did take place. He resided within the jurisdiction when the amended bill was filed, and up to the time of the application on this motion. The defendant's motion must be refused, with costs. The defendant may have eight weeks' time to answer.

VICE-CHANCELLOR OF ENGLAND'S COURT.

Saturday, June 28.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. CORPORATION OF BRISTOL.

Practice—Information and bill—Petition by a person not a party to suit—Sir Samuel Romilly's Act.

A decree had been pronounced and a reference to the Master to settle a scheme on behalf of a charitable foundation, upon an information and bill to administer the charity. Subsequent to the decree, the schoolmaster, with the sanction of the Attorney-General presented his petition, in the information and bill to which he had not been made a party, wherein he complained of having been dismissed by the trustees several years before the date of the decree, and praying the Court to determine the rights, as between himself and the trustees, in reference to the tenure of his office. Held, that the petition, having been presented by an individual who was no party to the record, and raising as it did important questions of right between the petitioner and the trustees, could not be entertained by the Court.

Held also, that the Court possesses no jurisdiction in such a petition, even if presented under Sir Samuel Romilly's Act, but that an original information ought to have been filed.

An information and bill had already been filed in this case by the Attorney-General, at the relation of several persons, inhabitants of Bristol, against the corporation of that city and the trustees, lately appointed by the Court, of the charities which formed the subject of the suit, and the Court had pronounced a decree on the 28th of January, 1842, establishing the charity and declaring that the property mentioned in the information had become vested in them in trust for the purposes of the charity, and referring it to the Master to ascertain of what the lands consisted, and to take an account of the rents and profits received by the corporation, and, after several consequential directions, the Master was ordered to settle a scheme for the future management and administration of the premises, school, and charity, and the application of the rents and income of the property. The Master had made his report, and the charity estate had been conveyed to the trustees, but no scheme had been approved of for the future administration of the charity, and no proposal had been carried in. In this state of affairs Dr. Goodenough, who had received a notice from the trustees in August 1837, that his engagement as master of the grammar-school was at an end, presented his petition in the information and bill, setting forth the different instruments of conveyance and devise by the several founders of the charities, the letters patent of Hen. 8, the devolution of the trust estates, &c. together with a general history of all the proceedings which had taken place affecting the charity; his own appointment as master in 1812, and the circumstances relating to his attempted dismissal from his office by the trustees; the decree pronounced on the present information, and the subsequent proceedings thereon, and stating that there had been no misconduct or violation on his part of any of the ordinances of the foundation which justified his displacement by the trustees, who had assigned no reason for so doing; and that, having been appointed before the passing of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 77, he could not be removed against his own consent; but that he was willing to surrender his office upon having the arrears of his salary paid, and a pension secured to him under the provisions of 3 & 4 Vict., and praying that it might be declared that, as head master of the grammar-school, he was now entitled to the salary and emoluments, &c.; that the arrears due to him might be paid out of the rents of the charitable estates, and that it might be referred to the Master to inquire whether it would be for the benefit of the charity that he should resign the mastership of the school on being allowed any and what allowance out of the rents and profits as a retiring pension, he thereby offering, on such pension being granted, to retire from his office.

James Parker and Bigg appeared to support the petition, but Bethell and Blunt, for the trustees, raised an objection to its merits being gone into, it having been presented on behalf of an individual who was no party to the record, and the Court was now called upon to determine, as between the trustees of the charity and the master of the school, whether he had or had not a freehold in his office, or whether the trustees had a power to remove him from that office. This raised a question which could not be determined except upon an original information; certainly not in its present shape, namely, a petition to an information to which the petitioner himself was not a party. The application was not even made to the Court under Sir Samuel Romilly's Act. (a)

Parker and Bigg contended that the objection by the trustees had been taken against good faith, as it was understood between the several parties out of court that the master's right to his office should come before the Court by a petition in the information; but, independently of such arrangement, the Attorney-General had sanctioned the petition, and that, therefore, the Court had jurisdiction to hear it.

Wray, for the Attorney-General, submitted his interests to the Court.

The Vice-Chancellor.—This is a petition presented in the information and bill of the Attorney-General, at the relation of a Mr. Pyle and several other persons, against the Corporation of Bristol and the trustees of the charity; and the object of the information and bill seems to be, in fact, to settle the charity upon a proper footing, and to refer it to the Master to settle a scheme. Dr. Goodenough is himself no party to it, and now he presents a petition praying that the Court will determine a question which in no manner seems to have been determined by the decree made in 1842. But which, if there had been no such decree, must have been determined by an original suit by an information. The Corporation of Bristol, as I understand, do not mean to concede any thing; and all that I have got is this, that the Attorney-General consents to be bound by any thing that may be done upon the petition. The only question, therefore, is, how have I got a jurisdiction constituted as against the corporation?

Bigg.—The case of Chipping Sodbury School, as reported in 8th Law Journal, is a sufficient authority for your Honour's jurisdiction.

The Vice-Chancellor.—Was not that a petition under Sir Samuel Romilly's Act?

Bigg.—I suppose it must have been; although, upon searching the registrar's book, I do not find the Act referred to. The petition is only intituled in the matter of the charity.

The Vice-Chancellor.—This petition is presented for the purpose of determining with reference to a past transaction, namely, whether or not the Corporation of Bristol have that power which they profess they have.

Parker.—The Ludlow Charity case is exactly in point. What took place was as follows:—An information had been filed for the administration of the Ludlow charities; pending that information the relators and the defendants think of a compromise, and they are about to obtain an Act for that purpose. The schoolmaster, who was no party to the suit, presents a petition, and, having obtained the Attorney-General's sanction, comes in most adversely, and procures a reference to the Master to inquire as to the propriety of such compromise. At every stage he is fought, and was admitted by the Court as a party litigant in that suit, because the Court had, by means of the information, the whole administration of the charity property.

The Vice-Chancellor.—I am not now referring to the particular circumstances, but to the general point which was decided. It was this, that though Sir Samuel's Act gave jurisdiction for the regulation of a charity already constituted, yet, that it offered to the Court no power whatever to determine, as it were, originally what the constitution of the charity should be; that is the point.

Parker.—We do not profess to come here under Sir Samuel Romilly's Act; it is merely a proceeding in the information, this Court having the full administration of the charity by means of the decree which has been pronounced.

The Vice-Chancellor.—This petition, it strikes me, is not presented merely for the purpose of determining what ought to be done in the current course of management; but it is presented in such a manner as must necessarily involve the question as to what was the right of the trustees by law in the year 1837.

Bigg.—If that be your Honour's opinion, I should submit that, rather than drive Dr. Goodenough to file an information, the Court will follow the case of the Chipping Sodbury School, wherein your Honour decided that it being a grammar-school, a schoolmaster has primâ facie, in the absence of any thing else, a freehold office, or an office during good behaviour; that he cannot be dismissed without a good cause shewn; and that he was entitled not only to be retained in his office, but to be protected by an injunction against the proceedings in the ejectment which the trustees had instituted against him. That case was heard upon an appeal to the Lord Chancellor, who confirmed your Honour's judgment; but if the Court is of opinion that the technical difficulty is so great that it cannot be got over, your Honour will allow this petition to be instituted under Sir Samuel Romilly's Act, and to allow the Attorney-General to sign it.

The Vice-Chancellor.—It rather appears to me, that if the petition had been presented under Sir Samuel Romilly's Act, even that form of proceeding would not have afforded me jurisdiction over the question upon the abstract right. It is true I do not remember all the particulars of the Chipping Sodbury case, but I rather think that there the question was not respecting the abstract right or the constitution of the school, but it fell within the second part of Sir Samuel Romilly's Act, which empowers the Court to make regulations.

Bethell.—It is precisely the same which Lord Redesdale pointed out, where there exists no question among the persons interested in the trust; and the Court has acted upon it a dozen times.

Parker.—You refer to a case where the question arises with a party out of the charity. Surely, under the Act, a question between the schoolmaster claiming as an object of the charity and the trustees can be adjudicated upon.

The Vice-Chancellor.—I admit that in those cases wherein the rule is clear, and the only question is, whether the parties have acted according to the rule or not, that might be determined upon petition; but where the question is on what I would call the original constitution of the charity, whether certain persons called governors or trustees have a given authority; that is a question touching the original constitution of the school, to be decided only upon an information. I am quite satisfied in my mind that in the petition of the Chipping Sodbury school the point did not arise, because there had been so much talk about it. It was a matter known to all the Profession. The very fact that the objection was made by Sir Anthony Hart in the way that it was, was sufficient to call the attention of the Profession to the circumstance, and I do not believe any one had the least doubt what the question really was; and if there had been no such solemn decision in the House of Lords, every one would have acquiesced in that which ultimately was the decision. Therefore I am satisfied that no such point ever did or could have arisen.

Bigg.—We are not at present under the Act of Sir Samuel Romilly, and we thought that the Court would adjudicate as between the trustees and the schoolmaster where there was an authority for so doing.

The Vice-Chancellor.—The Court might adjudicate upon the question whether a given course of conduct, which was to be maintained by the rule, was in pursuance of the rule.

Bigg.—The Lord Chancellor in the case referred to entered into the question, whether, upon looking into the original deeds on the endowment of the school, it was a free grammar-school; and having ascertained the fact, he arrives at that important conclusion, that where it was a grammar-school the office of the master was freehold.

The Vice-Chancellor.—As I best recollect the Chipping Sodbury case, the circumstance of which the master complained made a considerable impression upon me at the time, because it appeared to have been one wherein there was a most tyrannical and arbitrary exertion of power. The question was, had there been any abuse of an acknowledged power. But the question now here raised is, whether the trustees have the power at all. It may be true that a certain transaction took place in the year 1610, in the shape of a decree, which might be held, as it partly appears to have been held by the decree, unavailing. But if part of the case only is made to rest upon it, how is it to be determined upon a petition? It really does seem to me that what has been acknowledged to be the rule respecting proceedings under what is commonly called Sir Samuel Romilly's Act is a rule which shews me that I have no jurisdiction even under his Act. As a petition in the case, it is perfectly certain that the cause does not authorize me to enter into this question, which relates to certain transactions which took place five years before the decree was made.

Petition dismissed, with costs.

ROLLS COURT.

July 8 and 15.

Sturge v. Dimsdale.

Practice — Unopposed petition — Fees to senior and junior counsel, allowance of — Appointment of new trustees — Payment of money out of court.

Both senior and junior counsel's fees on the taxation of a solicitor's bill of costs may be allowed, though given for their appearance in support of an unopposed petition, which often requires as much care and attention as an opposed petition.

The general principle of such allowance rests upon the ground of the assistance which the Court is entitled to have from counsel, and which it cannot have entirely from those of either the junior or senior bar.

Experience, knowledge, and skill are required in counsel to find out what is necessary to be stated to the Court, and a junior counsel is not always able to give that assistance.

Ann Dimsdale, by her will, bearing date the 21st of March, 1834, gave the residue of her property to ten charitable institutions (of which the British and Foreign Bible Society and the Moravian Missionary Society were two), and appointed Martha Young, Young Sturge, and Peter Challacombe executors and trustees. The testatrix died in July 1836, and soon after a suit was instituted for the administration of her estate, in which a final order was made on further directions on the 9th of June, 1843. Martha Young being the only surviving trustee, and being desirous of being discharged from the office, presented a petition on the 25th of May, 1844, for the appointment of new trustees, stating the will, the suit, and all the proceedings consequent thereon; and also stating that the trust fund was then standing vested partly in the name of the petitioner, partly in the name of the testatrix, partly in the name of Young Sturge, and partly in the names of the petitioner and Young Sturge; the amount of the fund being over 25,000*l.* On the 24th of June, 1844, an order was made on the petition, referring it to the Master; and on the 26th of July the Master made his report. On the 27th of the same month a petition was presented to confirm the Master's report, and on the 30th an order was made thereon, directing the appointment of the trustees according to the report; that the Master should have a good deed of trust prepared; and that there should be a reference to the Master to tax the petitioner and all parties appearing their costs of the order of reference of the 24th of June, 1844, and those relating to the petition to confirm. On the taxation the Master disallowed the item of the bill of costs of the petitioner's solicitor, which related to the fees and other expenses attendant upon the briefs delivered to senior counsel, both as to the petition to appoint new trustees and the petition to confirm the Master's report, on the ground, as was alleged, that it was sufficient to employ a junior counsel alone in the case of an unopposed petition. On the 31st of May the Taxing Master issued his certificate; the bill of costs, amounting to 215*l.* 3*s.* 3*d.* being taxed at 180*l.* 9*s.* 5*d.* The item which was objected to only amounted to 10*l.* 7s. 8d. The petitioner now applied for an order to the Master to review his taxation; and after stating at length the whole of the proceedings, the petition prayed that the Taxing Master be ordered to review his taxation, and to allow all or such items as the Court should think fit; or that the petitioner might be at liberty to file exceptions to the certificate of the Master, &c.; and that the costs of this application might be paid out of the same fund as the other costs ordered to be paid by the order of the 30th of July, 1844. The senior counsel employed by the petitioner to support the two petitions in reference to the appointment of new trustees had not been the counsel of the petitioner and her co-plaintiff, Young Sturge, in the prosecution of the suit, but had acted all along on behalf of the remaining eight charities, other than the two already mentioned.

Turner, for the petitioner, contended that the Taxing Master ought to have allowed the item in question, because the case was one of sufficient importance to render it necessary to have the assistance of a senior as well as a junior counsel; inasmuch as the proceeding was to affect the administration and disposal of funds over 25,000*l.* being the remainder as yet undisposed of, and as the funds were standing in different names. The senior counsel, also employed by the petitioner, had been employed in the cause all through, and the junior was the counsel who had settled the pleadings, and therefore it was right to have the aid of both to protect the petitioner and the other parties not before the Court. The petition was that of a trustee to be discharged from the trust; and therefore, unless that was properly done, the trustee would continue liable always to the cestui que trust, and the trusts being complicated, the petitioner was entitled, at the expense of the estate, to have for her protection both a senior and a junior counsel in all applications to the Court, but especially that for the appointment of new trustees. Besides the benefit of retainer to the senior counsel would have been lost if he were not employed in support of the petition. In Cooke v. Turner (12 Sim. 649), the ground for allowing the double fee was in order to instruct the junior bar.

Bacon, for the British and Foreign Bible Society and the Moravian Missionary Society, did not not think it was necessary to controvert the proposition of the other side, that on most occasions it was proper to have more than one counsel; nor had the Master done so, but had merely said that, in the exercise of his discretion in the particular case, he considered one counsel sufficient, as there was no question to be argued which would render the employment of two necessary. The cause had been heard, and a final order made, and therefore there was nothing more to be done. No grounds had been laid, except the general principle, for the employment of more than one counsel, unless the allegation that petitioner, having retained counsel, would lose the benefit of the retainer by not employing the senior counsel, can be considered a ground. But there was nothing for him to do, and the Master had in his discretion, therefore, disallowed the charge. The case of Cooke v. Turner is not in point; for this is the case of a suit ended, and all that is needed is to tell the Court the progress of it up to the present time, for which purpose there was no use for two counsel. If there was any prospect of litigation, such a course might be proper; but when nothing of that kind is or can be contemplated, it was unreasonable to burden the fund with large costs. The petition also complaining of the taxation, sets out the will and the subsequent proceedings at length; but it was useless to rehearse the circumstances on every occasion, particularly in petitions which were merely of course.

Turner, in reply, contended that the petitioner had a right to be discharged at the expense of the testator's estate, and to have the benefit of the retainer. The case required great care, and the trustee must be duly discharged, and the funds duly transferred to the new trustees, else the petitioner would remain liable. The fund remaining unadministered is of large amount, and standing in different names, and the assistance of counsel in making the transfer, &c. was therefore necessary. Unopposed petitions require great care, and the rule contended for would be prejudicial to the course of business. The length of the petition was rendered necessary because of the course pursued by the Master. It would have been useless to make a simple statement of the Master's refusing to allow the item in question; it was absolutely necessary to state all the facts and dealings with the trust-fund.

The MASTER of the ROLLS.—I shall not make any order on this petition till I have had some communication with the Taxing Master. This is the case of proceedings on an unopposed petition. These petitions are of the utmost importance, and by them large sums of money are disposed of; and they are frequently of great complication, and are therefore not to be understood without the application to them of a well-experienced mind, nor without the most careful attention; and if I had not the assistance of able counsel, I could not in many cases come to a satisfactory conclusion. The cases depend on a variety of circumstances, not only to be considered out of court, but occurring during the course of proceedings, and the assistance of experienced leading counsel is necessary to be had to dispose of them properly. No case was less safe in which to lay down a general rule than that of unopposed petitions. Their complication is often great, and not to be understood without much care; and payments of money out of court are made upon them to the enormous amount of 4,000,000*l.* in the year, not to speak of transfers to an equal amount; the notion, therefore, of depriving the Court of the assistance of able and experienced counsel was entirely out of the question. But cases may and do occur so plain and simple, that the assistance of counsel is not required at all, and in such cases I am desirous, if I can accomplish it, to render a simple application by the solicitor to one of the officers of the court sufficient, without the intervention of counsel. The present is not a case of that kind. There is a new trustee to be charged with the trusts, and an old one to be released from the duty, and therefore the proceeding is one of much importance; and as there may be reason to do as the Master has done, I shall inquire what were his grounds. There is no difficulty about the general principle, it does not rest on the doctrine of retainer, nor upon the other grounds put forward, but the true ground is, the assistance the Court is entitled to have, and which it cannot have entirely from counsel of either the one or the other class. I mean no disrespect to the junior bar, but it is matter of experience that, where assistance is wanted from counsel, I cannot rely on the junior bar, and that many times I am unable to dispose of petitions in which they appear, and which it is often necessary to let stand over till the assistance of senior counsel be obtained. Experience, knowledge, and skill are required to find out what is necessary to be stated to the Court; and from concealment of this necessary information a judgment is obtained, and a petition unopposed, and property paid over to persons who have no right to it, to the prejudice of others, and justice fails to be done, and an injury inflicted which cannot be repaired. I shall see the Master on the subject.

His Lordship, on a subsequent day, intimated that he had seen the Master, who had informed him that he had asked for the vouchers for the payment of the sum in question, and that they had not been produced to him, which was a sufficient reason in itself for the disallowance.

Turner, on a subsequent day, applied for leave to put in an affidavit to explain what took place in the Master's office, but his Lordship refused the application, at which he expressed himself surprised.

TUCK v. RAYMENT.

Practice—Master in rotation—Irregularity—Reference and application.

When the clerk of records and writs (formerly a six clerk) gives his certificate as to the state of a cause, if the Master has not been already fixed for attending to the business in the cause, the practice is to carry the certificate to the sitting Master to have marked upon it the Master in rotation to whom the reference or application is to be made, and then to return it to the clerk of records and writs. but it is irregular so to do, if by any proceeding the Master to take charge of the business in the cause has been already fixed, for then every application should be made to him. but, under the circumstances of the case, indulgence was granted.

Any application in the cause is a reference to satisfy the Orders of 21st December, 1833.

This was an application by the plaintiff to the Court to order that one of two Masters, who both repudiated the jurisdiction, should hear exceptions taken to the answer of a defendant in the cause.

Addis, for the plaintiff, said that the plaintiff had, on the 9th of June, 1845, excepted to the answer of one of the defendants for insufficiency, and that, on the 20th of the same month, an order of reference was obtained, which was, accordingly, carried to the Master's office (public) first, and marked with the name of Master Brougham, as the Master in rotation. A warrant was then, on the 23rd of June, taken out for the 2nd of July, and on the parties attending on that day, an objection was taken to Master Brougham's hearing the exceptions, and he thereupon refused to do so. They say, on the other side, that they applied to a vacation Master (Sir W. Horne) to enlarge the time to answer, and that therefore he was the proper Master to apply to here; but he refuses to take cognizance of the matter, because he is not the Master in rotation. The plaintiff is, therefore, deprived of the benefit of his exceptions, the fortnight having expired. But it is clear that Master Brougham was the proper person to apply to, and it does not follow, because the vacation Master gave time to answer, that he is, therefore, the person to proceed with the other business in the cause. The 16th order of the 21st December, 1833 (Beav. Ord. 48), says, that as to all bills where a reference is made, the name of the Master, &c.; shewing that where there has been only an application, but not a reference, the order applies, and therefore Master Brougham is the Master to hear these exceptions. The 25th of the same orders provides for an application to the vacation-Master; but it does not follow, therefore, that if such an application be made, all the rest of the business must necessarily go to the same Master. [The MASTER of the ROLLS.—You say the first was not a reference, but only an application. The question depends upon whether you should have got an order for the Master in rotation or a special order to Sir Wm. Horne.]

Greene, contrà.—I cannot recognise my own case in the description of it just given. The affidavit does not state the fact where it says there had been no previous reference; there was a reference to Sir Wm. Horne, not as vacation Master, but as Master in rotation. The certificate of the clerk of the records and writs is to that effect, which certificate is dated 3rd February, 1845, and was made in consequence of an application for a month's time to answer. On the 2nd of March, a warrant was taken out for the 6th for further time before Sir Wm. Horne, and on the 17th another warrant for the 20th, when time was granted by the same Master. Their reference was in June, after all these orders for time, and what do they do then? They go not to the clerk of the records and writs, to whom the duty is now transferred from the six clerks, but to the Masters' public office, and get Master Brougham marked down as the Master in rotation. The affidavit calls Sir William Horne the vacation Master, but he was not. The substance of the application is to obtain an enlargement of the time to except. They had no business in the Masters' public office at all, unless on the occasion of the first attendance on the 3rd February, to ascertain the Master in rotation, who was the Master for every subsequent application. They therefore misled the officer.

Addis was unwilling that the error should be fastened on his client, and not on the Master. It is said that the order of reference should not have been dealt with as we have done. [The MASTER of the ROLLS.—The clerk of records and writs gives his certificate as to the state of the cause, and it is carried to the Master's office, and there marked, and then carried back to the clerk of records and writs.] No application was ever made by us. [The MASTER of the ROLLS.—What about the orders for time?] They were made by the defendants; the first order of reference we obtained was this one. The sitting Master altered the name of Master Brougham to that of Sir William Horne. He cited Burrell v. Nicholson (6 Sim. 213).

The MASTER of the ROLLS said he had a strong disposition to set the matter right, if there was a proper case made out for doing so; but the case set up was not one of peccavi on the part of the plaintiff, but an attempt to shew the Master was wrong. The notice of motion had reference entirely to an application for an order to the Master to hear the exceptions, and the usual general relief is asked; and now I wish to hear what are the merits on which to found it.

Addis said he relied on the fact of the plaintiff being a pauper, and that the defendant, having got three delays to answer, now attempts to prevent the plaintiff from being heard on circumstances connected with that indulgence to himself. The certificate of the 3rd of February, 1845, was never seen by us. [The MASTER of the ROLLS.—Yes, it was at the first attendance. Shew me it is necessary to the justice of the case that the motion be granted.] Oh! it is sworn that it is material and essential to the ends of justice.

Greene, contrà.—The suit is a suit to redeem, and my client is the assignee of an insolvent debtor; and, for the saving of expense and the satisfaction of the plaintiff, I recommend my client to answer and give an account rather than demur, which he might have done. The security, moreover, is insufficient.

Addis, in reply.

The MASTER of the ROLLS.—That a pauper case is often the most vexatious, no one who has had any experience in the business of the court can have any doubt; and, from blunders of the parties who are ignorant, there often arises vastly more vexation than is intended. However, in this case there was occasion, in February last, to make application to the Court to obtain time to answer, and a certificate was given in the clerk of the records and writs' office as to the state of the cause, which was carried to the sitting Master, and marked with the name of the Master in rotation, and returned; and the then Master in rotation was Sir William Horne. It is admitted that there were attendances on that application, and the plaintiff knew who was Master in rotation for the business in the cause. The answer was then put in, and exceptions being taken to it, they were referred. Now, nobody who has read the orders of the 21st of December, 1833, and knows the practice of the Court, can have any doubt that the order of reference of the exceptions should have been to the former Master, to whom the application of the 3rd February had been made. But it was to the Master in rotation, and it was taken to the public office to ascertain who was Master in rotation, and Master Brougham's name was inserted. The attendance was accordingly on the 2nd July, and it was objected that Master Brougham was not the Master in rotation, as he had been fixed by the prior proceeding. It having been ascertained that the former application had been before Sir Wm. Horne, his name is inserted at the p.. .... office by the sitting Master, and that of Master Brougham erased. Now, Sir Wm. Horne was not the Master in rotation then, but was so at the time of the former application. However, the name being altered, Sir Wm. Horne at first entertained the application, and wasted time precious to the plaintiff before he satisfied himself that he was not then the Master in rotation. A mistake has been make, and I am anxiously looking for grounds for indulgence. ot act on the motion to order the Master to consider the exceptions—it is a mistake enough. The attorney' clerk says it is essential to the ends of justice, but some better evidence is wanted. If I have a bonâ fide certificate, and that no vexatious or harassing proceeding is intended, I will grant indulgence. It is fairly said on the part of the defendants, that they wished to save expense, and to satisfy the plaintiff. Let there be an affidavit by the plaintiff and his solicitor.

Practice—Exceptions for impertinence—Orders of April 1828—Abandonment of old and filing of new exceptions.

The time allowed by the orders of 1828 for setting down exceptions for impertinence having expired, they cannot be abandoned, and new exceptions to the same effect and by the same parties filed in lieu of them.

In this case the answer was filed on the 17th of June last, and exceptions for impertinence were filed on the 9th July, but not being set down by some oversight in time, on the 16th July new exceptions of the same kind were taken in by the same parties, but the clerk of the records and writs refused to enter them for that reason.

Bilton now applied for an order for leave to file them, and read the 11th and 12th orders of April 1828. Amendments might be abandoned and new ones made. [The MASTER of the ROLLS.—It is in effect getting the time extended for taking the exceptions. What will you do with the other exceptions?] Take them off the file.

The MASTER of the ROLLS.—You can move to do so, and give notice to the other side. I will speak to the clerk of records and writs.

Thursday, July 31.—His Lordship intimated his opinion that the motion could not be granted.

WINCKWORTH v. WINCKWORTH.

Will, construction of—Vesting, subject to be divested.

A gift by a testator of his residuary estate to trustees for the benefit of his children, share and share alike, with a direction to them to pay only one moiety of their shares to daughters at twenty-one or marriage, and the interest of the other moiety to them for life, and at their decease to pay that moiety to their children, confers upon a daughter a vested absolute interest in that moiety, subject to be divested on there being children: therefore the will of a daughter who had arrived at twenty-one, but had never been married, gave to her legatees both moieties of her share.

John Winckworth, by his will of the 17th of October, 1801, gave the residue of his personal estate to the trustees of his will, upon trust for the benefit of all his children, share and share alike, their shares to be paid to sons at twenty-one, and a moiety of the shares of daughters to be paid to them at that age or marriage, and the interest of the other moiety to be paid to them for life, and the moiety itself to go to their children at their death. The testator appointed his wife, Margaret Winckworth, his son, Edward Winckworth, and John Soward, his executors and trustees; but by a codicil he revoked the appointment of the latter, and substituted Thomas Dawson and James Hugo Greenwell in his stead. In 1803 the testator died, leaving his widow and seven children, Edward, Henry, James, John, Henrietta, Lucy, and Eliza him surviving. The will was proved, and an administration suit (Winckworth v. Greenwell) was instituted, the children, who were all infants, being plaintiffs. In August 180: the cau was heard and the usual reference ordered. Various proceedings were afterwards taken, and an apportionment of the residuary estate which had been realized was ultimately, on the 8th of July, 1826, ordered, and the sum of 2,436*l*. 7s. 10d. Consols was entered to "the account of the plaintiff, Henrietta Winckworth." In 1829, Margaret Winckworth died, having by her will of the 27th of May, 1827, appointed the petitioner, John Winckworth, her sole executor. On the 27th of December, 1844, Henrietta Winckworth died unmarried having by her will of the 29th July, 1829, and codicil of January 11, 1838, appointed the petitioner, John Winckworth, her executor. James Hugo Greenwell and Thomas Dawson having also died, Edward Winckworth became the sole trustee and executor of his father. On the death of Henrietta, the question arose whether the moiety which on her decease was to go to her children, passed by her will, she not having any children, or whether it was undisposed of by the original testator, and must go to his executor. To ascertain this, John, the executor of Henrietta, presented his petition in the cause, praying that the Accountant-General might be directed to transfer to him the said sum of consols apportioned to Henrietta, and certain dividends accrued due on January 5, 1845, and any other dividends which, previous to the transfer, should accrue.

Kindersley (with him Renshaw).—The point to be decided in this case is whether the moieties given to the daughters for life, and afterwards to the children, were vested interests, liable to be divested in the event of the birth of children, or whether they had only life interests in those moieties, and the testator died intestate as to them, in the event which has happened, of a daughter dying unmarried, but having attained twenty-one. It is clear it is an absolute gift to daughters, after attaining twenty-one, if there are no children: but it is said to be absolute in the children; but unless the event happens as the testator mentions, it does not divest an absolute gift previously given, as in the case of a gift to two, and the death of either to go to the survivor; if both die, there is no survivor, and so the gift over does not take effect. They cited Sturgess v. Pearson (4 Man. 411); Locker v. Bradley (5 Beav. 593).

Turner, contrà.

The MASTER of the ROLLS.—There can be no doubt that an absolute interest in the first instance is given in the whole residue to the children, share and share alike. So far the words of the will give a vested interest; the other words that follow are to the effect of divesting the already vested interest. As to the daughte share, there is a special provision; one-half only is to be paid to them on attaining twenty-one, or marriage; the other half is to be settled and paid to the daughters for life, and at their death to their children. If there be no child, there is no direct mention of what is to be done; we must therefore fall back on the first clause, giving the absolute interest. It is plain, then, that the gift is that of a vested interest, subject to be divested only in the events pointed out, and therefore the moiety in question passes to the executor of Henrietta.

Re JONES.

Taxation of solicitor's bill after payment—Mortgagor and solicitor of mortgagee—Pressure—Payment under protest—Stat. 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73.

A mortgagor having paid the bill of the solicitor of the mortgagee, on the occasion of paying off the mortgage, is not entitled to have the bill taxed as against the solicitor, on the ground of alleged improper charges not payable by the mortgagee, unless there be other circumstances. Merely alleging that the bill is paid "under protest," without more, is not enough.

The petitioners, C. T. Thurston and T. B. Brown, were the surviving devisees and trustees of certain lands belonging to Edward Scott, which had been mortgaged by him for 3,000*l*. to one James Turner. In September 1844, the mortgage had become vested Edward Humphrey the surviving executor of Turner, and the title-deeds to the estate were in the hands of Messrs. Jones, Yearsley, and Howell, who were the solicitors to the Rev. Mr. Davies, who, as the husband of Turner's daughter, was beneficially interested in the mortgage. The petitioners also owed 400*l*. to Humphrey being the amount of a bond debt of their testator. Mr. Loughborough, the solicitor of the petitioners, having, at their request, offered to pay the principal sums due on the mortgage and bond, with interest thereon and reasonable costs as between mortgagor and mortgagee, and Messrs. Jones and Co. having refused to deliver up the title-deeds unless their own bill of costs, amounting to 107*l*. 11s. 7d. were paid, Loughborough on the 18th of September, 1844, paid their demand under protest. Several items of the bill, however, were objected to as unreasonable and unjust; as, for instance, a charge of 13*l*. incurred by Messrs. Jones and Co. in negotiating a loan from the Rev. C. T. C. Luxmore to pay off the mortgage, but which loan was not obtained. There was also a charge for drawing and another for copying an abstract of title, though an abstract was in existence down to the mortgage, and there was no need of a new one. There were also charges for perusing the release given by Humphreys to the petitioners, both by the solicitors of Davies and Messrs. Drew and Woosman, the private solicitors of Humphreys, and also a demand for interest and commission on money borrowed by Davies from bankers in Welchpool, after the expiration of the notice (22nd of June, 1844) to pay off the mortgage, and before the payment in September following. The petitioners offered to submit the whole matter to any solicitor in London, but Messrs. Jones and Co. would only agree to submit it to any attorney in Shropshire. Under these circumstances the petition was presented, and it was thereby alleged that the sum of ten guineas, part of the charge of 13*l*. which was paid to David Jones for surveying the property on which Mr. Luxmore was to lend the money, was not to be paid by the petitioners unless the negotiation went on; but it was broken off because Luxmore could not advance the money (being trust money) without the consent of his co-trustees; and, besides the charge could not be retained by them on the part of Davies, as it did not come within the description of mortgagee's costs. It was also said that the charge for interest, &c. to the bankers was only occasioned by Mr. Davies having to remit from place to place for his own convenience. None of the other disputed items, it was said, came within the principle of mortgagee's costs, and the offer to submit to arbitration was pressed. On the other hand, Messrs. Jones and Co. said that the negotiation with Luxmore was proceeding when, in February, T. B. Brown, one of the petitioners, who had been abroad, came home, and put an end to it. They also stated that the valuation by D. Jones was to be at the expense of the petitioners, and that Luxmore could advance the money himself. They also controverted the other statements of the petitioners, and stated that the arbitration was to be not by a London attorney, but by an indifferent person, and that Loughborough, on the part of the petitioners, had at first acceded to the offer made by Messrs. Jones and Co. Their bill of costs, they further stated, had been delivered to Loughborough, at his own request, early in August 1844, and a sufficient length of time previous to its payment.

Turner (with him Clarke), for the petitioners, contended that the petitioners were entitled to have the bill taxed, on the ground of their being obliged to pay it to get the deeds delivered, and as they had protested both at the payment of the bill and by letter afterwards. Besides, the charges themselves were very objectionable. Charging for a new abstract when they had an old one in their possession could not be permitted. They say, to be sure, that the abstract we speak of was given up to Luxmore, and the one they had was imperfect.

Kindersley (with him Giffard), for the Messrs. Jones and Co.—The sum in dispute is so small that but for the principle of the thing it would not be worth while to resist taxation. The Court has often said that where pressure exists taxation will be allowed; but in this case it is simply a question whether mortgagor or mortgagee is to bear the costs. Besides the survey of D. Jones, which was not to be charged, there is the charge to Drew and Woosman, the solicitors of Humphreys, which is not a charge against the mortgagee. [The MASTER of the ROLLS.—It is a nice question; the mortgagee may have to pay his solicitor costs not payable by the mortgagor, then what is the mortgagor to do?] Well, then it comes to a question between mortgagor and mortgagee. The present case involves more than merely the items. It is not merely the case of a payment of the bill, and then a petition for taxation; it is more; it is a taxation as between mortgagor and mortgagee. There could have been no taxation before the late Act, and the object of the Act was only to make the mortgagor, or the party who was chargeable, stand, after payment of the bill, in the shoes of the mortgagee or other party. The Messrs. Jones and Co. had Davies and Luxmore both as clients, and if they had themselves paid the bill of costs, they might or not have had it over against the mortgagor; but here it is whether the mortgagor shall be allowed to tax as against the solicitor.

Turner, in reply.

The MASTER of the ROLLS was of opinion that the mortgagor could not have taxation as against the solicitor, on the ground of the charges not being mortgagee's charges, that being a question entirely between the mortgagor and mortgagee; neither could taxation be allowed on the score of pressure, as that ground failed, the bill having been delivered long before payment. The petition must, therefore, be dismissed, and with costs.

VICE-CHANCELLOR KNIGHT BRUCE'S COURT.

Thursday, July 17.

DU PRE v. DUNCOMBE.

Demurrer—Statute of Limitations.

A bill was filed alleging that a receiver in a suit had not paid the sums due to the plaintiff, and that he had since passed his accounts, and it appeared from the statements in the bill that the sums had been due more than six years. To this bill a demurrer was held to be sustainable.

Whether the plaintiff had any remedy by petition in the suit in which the defendant was receiver, quære?

By letters patent, dated the 14th of October, 1531, a school was established at Berkhampstead, in the county of Hertford, over which there were to be a master and an usher. By an Act of 2 & 3 Edward 6, the master and usher, and their successors, were incorporated to hold lands, &c. and to pay certain stipends to the master and usher, &c. In 1774 a suit relating to the said school was instituted in this court, and by a decree in that suit the salary of the usher was fixed at 125*l*. 5s. 4d. per annum, and it was ordered that a receiver of the estates should be appointed, who should pay that salary. On the 30th of January, 1834, the plaintiff was appointed usher, and he continued in the office until his resignation in January, 1839. Before the appointment of the plaintiff to the office, during his holding it, and beyond the time of his resignation, the defendant was receiver of the estates under an order of the Court. The defendant received the rents, but did not pay the plaintiff, who was a relative, his salary, or any part thereof. The plaintiff having no immediate occasion for the money, permitted the salary to remain in arrear, confiding in the integrity of the defendant. At the time of his resignation, there was due to the plaintiff 626*l.* 6s. 8d. The bill, after stating these facts, proceeded thus:—"That various applications had been made to the defendant for payment, which he refused, pretending that he had paid to, or accounted with, the plaintiff for the said salary, and as evidence thereof, he alleges that in the accounts which he has passed in the said suit, as such receiver as aforesaid, in respect of the period during which the plaintiff was the usher of the said school, he has claimed and been allowed in each year the plaintiff's said salary of 125*l.* 5s. 4d. whereas the plaintiff charged the contrary, except as to one quarter's salary, and that if the payments had been allowed, they were obtained by fraud and by false representations." The bill then charged "that the said defendant will at times admit he has not paid to the plaintiff, or accounted with him for the said salary, or any part thereof, but then he pretends that he has passed his accounts, and been duly and regularly discharged from being receiver in the said cause, and that he is not now liable at the suit of the plaintiff to pay or make good the said several sums of money so retained by him as aforesaid." The bill then prayed an account and payment to the plaintiff of what should appear due, &c.

To this bill a demurrer was filed.

J. Parker and D. James, for the demurrer, cited Foster v. Hodgson (19 Ves. 180), and Foley v. Hill (1 Phillips, 399).

Russell and Osborne, for the bill, cited Sheldon v. Fortescue (3 P. Wms. 104), and Glossop v. Harrison (Coop. 61).

The Vice-Chancellor.—Whether in this case, on the facts alleged, the plaintiff has any remedy by petition in the cause of Attorney-General v. Du Pre, or has any remedy by action, I give no opinion. The question is whether he has a remedy by original bill, independent of the suit to which I have referred. Now, whether he would have had such a remedy by independent bill, notwithstanding the Statute of Limitations, and if the Statute of Limitations were out of the case, I give also no opinion. My impression is that, as against an original bill (this not being an application in the suit in which the receiver is or was appointed), the Statute of Limitations may be a good defence, because it is impossible for me to consider the receiver stands in the situation of a trustee, or that there are allegations in the bill which state him to be a trustee. The question then is whether such a case as is obnoxious to the Statute of Limitatio[ns is] here stated. I think there is. The statement made by the bill is this: "That by the means aforesaid, there became and was due to the plaintiff from the said defendant, as such receiver as aforesaid, on the — day of January 1839, and in respect of the plaintiff's said salary, as usher of the said school, the principal sum of 626*l.* 6s. 8d. which still remains due and owing to him from the said defendant." So that the statement is that the money was due in January 1839, and still remains due in July 1845. As it is now established that the Statute of Limitations may be made a good ground of demurrer, and as the bill states a case obnoxious to the Statute of Limitations, without alleging any facts to take it out of the statute, I think the demurrer must be allowed,—a decision quite independent of, and consistent with this, that there may be a remedy by petition, or there may be a remedy by action, of which I do not give any opinion.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

M'Intosh v. Midland Counties Railway Company.

A railway contractor having by deed contracted with a railway company for the construction of a portion of their railway for a certain price: after he had commenced the works, the company becoming anxious to open the railway by a certain day to the public, entered by deed into a second contract with him, by which the company covenanted to pay him the additional sum of 15,000l. for the expedition, he on his part undertaking that he, being allowed to make such railway, and being furnished with such materials, &c. as thereinafter covenanted were to be furnished by the company, would, on or before the 1st of June, 1840, so well and substantially as before mentioned complete the said railway by the said day. Then followed covenants by the company to provide him with certain materials, and it was then provided that in case he should not complete the said railway by the said day, then he should, on demand, pay to the company 300l. on the said day, and the like sum for every succeeding day till the said railway should be completed. The contractor having declared upon these deeds, and averred performance by himself generally, and nonpayment by the company, the defendants pleaded, as to parcel of the amount, that the plaintiff did not complete the railway by the day, and that in consequence of his failing to do so for a certain number of days, the defendants had the right of deducting 300l. a day, amounting to 7,500l. The replication denied that the defendants had such right modo et formâ. The jury at the trial having found that the plaintiff had not been supplied with the proper materials in due time by the company, Held, that the finding of such materials was not a condition precedent to their right of deduction, but was the subject of another action by the contractor against them, in which, if the failure on their part had been such as to prevent him from completing the railway in time, he would be entitled to recover as damages whatever sum they had become entitled to deduct in consequence of such non-completion.

This was an action brought by a railway contractor against a railway company, upon certain deeds of covenant. It was argued at great length, and both the arguments and the covenants are fully set out in the

JUDGMENT.

Alderson, B.—In the case of McIntosh v. The Midland Counties Railway Company, which was argued before the Lord Chief Baron, my brother Rolfe, my brother Platt, and myself, we think there should be a new trial. The action is founded on two deeds of covenant, by the first of which, after various recitals, it was witnessed, "that, in consideration of the sum of 258,639*l.* 10s. 6d. agreed to be paid by the defendants, the plaintiff undertook to complete the said railway from a certain point in the borough of Leicester to its junction with the Birmingham Railway at Rugby." The declaration contains an averment, "that after the making of that first deed of covenant, and during the progress of the works under it, the defendants, by a second indenture of covenant, dated the 23rd day of March, 1839, after reciting among other things that the defendants were desirous that the permanent way should be completed on or before the 1st of June, 1840, so that the railway might be opened for the use of the public on that day, and that the plaintiff had agreed to expedite the last-mentioned works, and also to lay and complete the permanent line of railway, so that the whole line of railway might be opened to the public on the 1st of June, 1840, and also to maintain and keep in repair such permanent line of railway for such term as therein mentioned, in consideration of the defendants paying him the further sum of 15,000*l.* as a further consideration for the works in the first contract, and for such expedition, and completing the same as aforesaid. Then it was witnessed that, in pursuance of that agreement, he undertook that, he being allowed to make such further side-cuttings and spoil-banks, and being found and provided with such railway-bars, or rails, chairs, backs, sleepers, and spikes, for temporary and permanent use, as thereinafter mentioned, should, on or before the 1st day of June, 1840, so well and substantially and in a good and workmanlike manner, make and complete in all things the said portion of the said railway, in the original contracts contracted and agreed to be made by him. Then it specifies how it was to be completed on or before the first day of June, and then goes on to set out certain covenants and agreements by the company with Mr. McIntosh, that they would supply the different articles, the rails, spikes, chairs, and other materials, on given days and in given proportions. And then the second agreement contained a proviso, which is also set forth in the declaration, which is to this effect: 'Provided nevertheless, and it was thereby expressly agreed and declared between and by the said parties thereto, and particularly by and on the part of the said David McIntosh, that in case the said David McIntosh, his executors or administrators, should not so make, complete, and finish the whole of the said railway and works so contracted to be made and completed by him as aforesaid, together with said permanent line and all the works connected therewith, and deliver over the same unto the said company on or before the 1st day of June, so that the said railway might be capable of being opened by the said company for the use of the public at any hour on that day, on which the said company might be so desirous of so opening the same as aforesaid, then, and in such case, the said David McIntosh, his heirs, executors, and administrators, should and would, on demand, pay to the said company the sum of 300*l.* on the said 1st day of June, and the like sum for every succeeding day, Sundays only excepted, until the whole of the said railway should have been so made and completed, and delivered over to the said company, capable of being opened by them to the public at such hour as aforesaid." The declaration then proceeded generally to aver that Mr. McIntosh completed all the covenants which it was incumbent on him to comply with, and that the defendants had not paid him the money. To this declaration the fifth plea of the defendants, which is pleaded only as to 7,500*l.* part of the sum demanded, states, in substance, that the plaintiff did not complete the railway on the 1st day of June, 1840, according to the terms of the second indenture, and that in consequence of his failing to do so for the space of twenty-four days, exclusive of Sundays, the defendants had the right of deducting from the sum to be paid to him certain sums amounting altogether to the sum of 7,500*l.* The replication to this plea denies only that the plaintiff was liable to pay in manner and form as in the plea is alleged. The question is, what is the issue thereby raised. The Lord Chief Baron at the trial thought the defendants were bound, as a condition precedent to their right of deducting any part of the 15,000*l.* to furnish the plaintiff with the materials stipulated for, in the manner and at the time mentioned in the second indenture, and that as they had not done so (which question the jury had found for the plaintiff), the failure of the plaintiff to complete on the 1st of June, 1840, did not make him liable to the deduction on which the defendants insisted; but after fully considering this question, we think the true construction of the deed, and the true question raised by the pleadings is only whether the railway was completed on the 1st of June, 1840, and that if not so completed, the plaintiff became liable to allow the daily deduction of 300*l.* for the non-completion; and that the fifth plea was in truth made out, if the number of days for which the deduction was claimed was established. The covenant on the plaintiff's part is absolutely to complete on a given day, or to pay 300*l.* a day if he does not. Any other construction would lead to this conclusion (which we think an unreasonable one), that the non-supply of a single rail or chair at the time specified for its delivery, although in the result wholly immaterial to the facilities for completion, would entitle the plaintiff to receive the 15,000*l.* given as expedition money, without his giving the expedition for it. On the other hand, by treating the covenants as independent, it is open to the plaintiff, if he has really been prevented from completing the railway in due time by the defendants' neglect, to bring his action against them for the breach of their covenant. In such an action it would be open to the jury to give a full redress for all the damages, including those deductions caused by the defendants' neglect which the plaintiff may have sustained; and in this way equal justice would be done to both parties. On the whole, we have come to the conclusion that this is the proper construction to be put on the covenant in the second indenture, and that this is the issue raised in the replication to the fifth plea; and we think, therefore, there should be a new trial.

COMMISSIONERS' COURTS.

(Before Mr. Commissioner Shepherd.)

On Saturday last several summonses were returnable under the last new Act, and the commissioner, upon inspecting the office copies of the judgment-rolls, expressed his doubts as to his jurisdiction,—the judgments having been signed for much larger sums than 20*l.*

The attorneys in the respective cases then tendered the judgment-papers in the actions, and also affidavits or declarations from the plaintiffs stating the true amounts of the debts claimed by them from the defendants; but the commissioner said he could only look at the amount for which the judgments were signed, and which were the records of the superior courts, by which he could alone be guided, and the office copies of which were then before him.

Buchanan addressed the Court, and stated that the judgment papers bore the seal of the Court, and also the Master's allocatur, and which was sufficient to prove the amount of the costs as taxed.

Clarke begged to observe to the Court, that it would be very desirable that some uniform principle and practice should be acted upon; for as the matter now stood, upon many points one commissioner decided one way one day, and another directly opposite the next day, so that there was no knowing what to do; however, to obviate all difficulties in such cases as the present, if attorneys would do as he did, no question could arise. Mr. Clarke then explained to the commissioner that in drawing a declaration for even 15*l.* it might be necessary to have three or four counts, and each count might be laid at 20*l.*; and therefore, if judgment should be signed by default, the clerk of the judgments would sign the judgment for the whole penalty, covering all the counts unless a remittitur was entered in the roll for such part of the penalty as the plaintiff did not seek to recover, leaving the residue the exact amount of the debt due to the plaintiff.—The Commissioner thanked Mr. Clarke for this explanation; and Mr. Buchanan said (ironically) that no doubt the Profession would feel obliged to Mr. Clarke.

Clarke said, what he had stated was done with no desire to create trouble and work to the Profession, but quite the reverse; for it was much harassing and troublesome to have matters as they now stood, and every thing to remain a matter of uncertainty and chance; and he would respectfully submit to the Court that it would be for the convenience of the commissioners, the Profession, and their clients, that the question of jurisdiction should be ascertained before summonses were granted, otherwise, as to day, attorneys, with their clients, are brought before the Court to no purpose.

The learned Commissioner said it would no doubt be very desirable that some uniform practice should be come to.

Two cases were adjudicated upon, in which sums of 2s. and 2s. 6d. weekly were ordered to be paid by the respective defendants, and the subject dropped—several attorneys, plaintiffs, and defendants leaving the court, the former having no locus standi on account of the amounts in the office copies of the judgments appearing to be above 20*l.* and for which judgment had been signed.

Ecclesiastical Courts.

PREROGATIVE COURT.

Wednesday, August 6, 1845.
(Before Sir J. Jenner Fust, Bart.)

will made previously to the Wills Act, not signed, though having the testimonium clause, and without the day of the month, by which property was given to A. M. P. who was reputed to be the daughter of the testator, no other will having been made, and he having been proved to have declared his intention of providing for the said A. M. P.—Held to be a valid will.

This was a question as to the validity of the will of Capt. Francis Powell, who died suddenly on the 12th of January, 1844. The will, which was propounded by Anna Maria Powell, represented to be his daughter, legitimate or illegitimate, a fact of which, however, there was not positive proof, was in the d[illegible] handwriting, and written in 1827, but was not signed, sealed, or attested; although it had an attestation clause. Its validity was opposed by Mr. John Powell, nephew of the deceased, alleging himself to be his only next of kin.

Curties, on behalf of Miss Anna Maria Powell, contended that the evidence rebutted the presumption of law against the will, which the deceased (who had a notion that, as a military man, his testament, without any formalities would be valid) intended to have effect and operation, although not signed. The deceased had treated Miss Powell as his daughter.

Addams, for the nephew, on the other hand, argued that there was no proof to rebut the presumption against the paper, and characterized this as a case of as gross fraud as had ever come before the Court. The conduct of Anna Maria Powell was inconsistent with her belief that she was the deceased's daughter; for, in writing to Ireland to announce his death, she called him "her dear lamented uncle."

The learned judge gave judgment in this case, which related to a paper pronounced as the will of Captain F. Powell, bachelor, who died on the 12th of July, 1844. The paper, which was dated so long ago as July, 1827, bequeathed the property of the deceased to Anna Maria Powell, spinster. It was, however, not signed, though it had what is termed a testin[illegible] "In witness whereof I have hereto set my hand and seal," nor was the day of the month inserted. Under the old law, which applied to this case, such a paper, if proved to be final and to have been intended by the deceased to operate, would, nevertheless, be sufficient to pass personal estate. The validity of the paper was disputed by Mr. John Powell, nephew and only next of kin of the deceased. It appeared that Miss Anna Maria Powell had been brought up and educated by the deceased, with whom she lived, and was considered by his acquaintance and friends to be his daughter, legitimate or illegitimate; but he did not call her his daughter, nor did she call him father, but uncle, and even in the paper in question she was only [illegible] P., spinster." After his death, Miss Powell was advised that the paper in question was invalid, and therefore she obtained letters of administration of the effects of the deceased, as his legitimate daughter, having [illegible] able to procure a certificate of her baptism, [illegible], it appearing that she was the daughter of Francis and Hannah Powell. [illegible] he inferred her legitima[illegible]. At the suit of the nephew, this administration was called in, and it appeared from the evidence (though some mystery hung over the question) that she was the illegitimate daughter of the deceased. The learned judge observed that, primâ f[illegible] such a paper as this was not entitled to probate. [illegible] could it be proved without extrinsic evidence t[illegible] that the deceased intended that it should have [illegible] and operation in its then state. Now, there was evidence to shew his affection and regard for Miss Powell; declarations from him that "he had made his will" (and no other will could be traced); that he had made his will in 1827 (the actual date of the will in question); and that he had provided for Miss Powell; and, under all the circumstances, especially considering that the paper had been preserved by the deceased, he thought the Court was at liberty to pronounce for the validity of the paper. It was a question of considerable difficulty; but, there being a balance of evidence in favour of its being the intention of the deceased that the paper should operate, notwithstanding its imperfect state, he thought he was bound to pronounce for its validity, and decree administration with the will annexed (the executor having renounced) to Miss P[illegible] costs to be paid out of the estate.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

June 21.
Reg. v. Gruby and Viner.

Indictment for obtaining money under false pretences. The words "unlawfully did falsely pretend" are sufficient, without any further allegation of a scienter. Where the pretence on which the money was obtained is properly negatived and proved to be false, the negation in the indictment of other facts which are proved to be true, will not vitiate.

The jurors for our Lady the Queen upon their oath present, that James Gruby, late of the parish of Saint Martin in-the-Fields in the county of Middlesex, labourer, and Lee Viner, late of the parish aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, labourer, on the 27th day of September in the eighth year of the reign of our Sovereign Lady Queen Victoria, at the parish aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, and within the jurisdiction of the Central Criminal Court, unlawfully did falsely pretend to one Mary Price, that a certain paper writing then produced by the said James Gruby and Lee Viner to the said Mary Price, was a lease of a certain messuage and dwelling-house situate No. 2, White Hart-street, in the parish and county aforesaid, from the said James Gruby to the said Mary Price, for the term of nine years from the day and year aforesaid; by means of which said false pretences the said James Gruby and the said Lee Viner did then and there, and within the jurisdiction of the said Central Criminal Court, unlawfully obtain from the said Mary Price one promissory note of the Governor and Company of the Bank of England, commonly called a bank-note, for the payment of 100*l.* of the value of 100*l.*; one other promissory-note, &c.; the said several bank notes then and there being the bank-notes, goods and chattels, property and money of the said Mary Price, with intent to cheat and defraud her, the said Mary Price, of the same, whereas in truth and in fact the said paper writing then and there produced to the said Mary Price by the said James Gruby and Lee Viner was not a lease of the said messuage and dwelling-house from the said James Gruby to the said Mary Price for the term of nine years, or for any other term, nor was the same a lease of the said messuage and dwelling-house or of any messuage or dwelling-house, to the great damage and deception of the said Mary Price, to the evil example of all others in the like case offending, against the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace of our lady the Queen, her power and dignity.

The prisoners were charged by the above indictment with having obtained money by false pretences; that on which the prosecutrix swore she parted with her money, being the representation that the lease was a valid one for nine years. On being produced, it appeared to be a valid lease for three years, but the figure 3 had been erased by a pencil and 9 substituted.

Ballantine, for the prisoners, contended that the indictment was bad on the face of it, and that it was not supported by the evidence. In the first place, there was no allegation of a scienter, and without this there could be no offence. R. v. Henderson (1 C. & Mar. 328) is an authority to shew the necessity of averring knowledge of the pretence being false. A man may very innocently make an untrue statement. Secondly, the negation of the truth of the pretences is too large. The pretence itself is that the lease was for nine years, and afterwards it is alleged that the lease was not a lease for nine years or for any other time, [illegible] the same a lease of any messuage or dwelling[illegible] Now, as the prosecutor has chosen to make [illegible] the [illegible] rms, he must prove it to its full extent. But the lease is clearly good for three years, and the allegation being bad in part is bad altogether. What is the nature of the issue between the parties? The indictment starts with a certain proposition; the plea denies it; the proposition turns out to be fa[illegible] the plea must therefore be true. If I state that a book and an inkstand are on this table, and my statement is denied, if in fact th[illegible] [inks]tand is here, but the book is not, I am wrong, and my opponent is right.

R. C. Robinson, for the prosecution.—First with regard to the scienter. The word unlawfully appears in the indictment, and that is sufficient. Unless the pretences were made knowingly, they would not be unlawful. It is merely the use of a more comprehensive word. The case of R. v. Henderson is no authority, because there the word unlawfully was omitted. All that the case decides therefore is that the word "falsely" is of itself insufficient. There must be an allegation of knowledge or something equivalent, and it is impossible to say that in the word "unlawfully," knowledge is not implied. 2nd. The negation of the truth of the pretences is sufficient. It is divisible into several propositions, separated by the conjunction "or," and as the first fully denies the truth of the pretence alleged, the rest may be rejected. If fifty other pretences were alleged and negatived, still if that was the one which alone induced the prosecutrix to part with her money, though the others were proved never to have been made, the prisoners might still be convicted. Suppose then that in the early part of the indictment, after the allegation of the pretence that the lease was for nine years, such other pretences had been stated as are denied to be true in the latter part: on the evidence as here given, they might be rejected. But if that is so with some of the pretences themselves, still more clear is it that we may reject the mere negation of pretences that have never been alleged. The plea of "not guilty" does not put in issue all that is alleged in the indictment. It merely traverses that which is material to sustain the charge alleged; otherwise where a man was indicted for stealing twenty different articles, he would be entitled to an acquittal unless all were proved to have been stolen.

Ballantine, in reply.—The word "unlawfully" is not a sufficient substitute for the scienter. Many things may be done unlawfully which are not done knowingly, and still more which may not be done criminally. Again, the proposition in the latter part of the indictment is not divisible. At least the words "for the term of nine years, or for any other term," is one single allegation, even although the rest should be looked upon as distinct.

Mr. Commissioner Bullock thought the points were well worthy of mature consideration, and if the prisoners were convicted, he would consult the judges on the subject. The prisoners were convicted.

Friday, July 11.—The learned commissioner now stated that he had spoken to two of the judges on the subject, and they were of opinion with him that the indictment was good, and supported by the evidence.

Wednesday, Sept. 16.
Reg. v. North.

Where the attorney of a defendant on a criminal trial holds, as attorney for another person, a document which he admits to have with him in court, and the production of which is requisite for the purposes of the trial, he is bound to produce it, although he has not been served with a subpœna duces tecum.

The prisoner was indicted for perjury, committed on a trial in which one Parsons was plaintiff, and a person named Cox defendant. The perjury consisted in swearing that a certain cheque was paid by Cox to Parsons. For the purposes of the present trial, it was necessary on the part of the prosecution that the cheque should be produced, and being proved to have been in the possession of Cox, and his attorney being the attorney of the defendant, he was called upon to produce it.

Ballantine, for the defendant, refused to do so until the prosecutors had proved the service of a subpœna duces tecum.

Clarkson, for the prosecution, then put the following question to the attorney—Have you now in your possession, and in court, the cheque, the subject-matter of the action of Parsons against Cox?

Ballantine submitted that the attorney was not bound to answer. If he held the cheque at all, it was as attorney for Cox, and as this cheque was now the subject of another action, in which Cox was interested, its production might materially affect the client's interest.

The Recorder.—I think the attorney cannot refuse to answer the question. It is a matter quite distinct from his right to produce.

The question was answered in the affirmative.

Clarkson then contended that the cheque, being in court, must be produced, and that the subpœna duces tecum was dispensed with.

The Recorder.—I think the cheque must be forthcoming. The attorney has had no notice to produce, but then he is not the attorney for the defendant here. He holds it on the part of Cox. If this were a civil proceeding, it might be that the attorney would not be compellable to produce the document, but as far as the Crown is concerned, he has no greater privilege than his client would have, who would be compelled, if he had it in court, to exhibit it for the purposes of the trial. But care shall be taken that it is seen by no other persons than by the Court, the counsel, and the jury.

THE LEGISLATOR.

Summary.

ONLY one statute remains to be given, but it is a long and important one—the Commons Inclosure Act. A portion of it will appear in our next. We hope then to have published every statute of any utility to the practitioner; and it would be unwise to burden our columns with such as are not likely to be generally referred to, so as to displace more valuable matter. Again we ask our readers to peruse with care the report of the Criminal Law Commissioners. W trust that next session will witness the perfecting of their valuable labours in the achievement of that which will be the noblest legal work of our age—the Codification of the Criminal Law.

THE MAGISTRATE.

Summary.

ALL our contributors are taking holiday, and we are therefore compelled to leave this division of the LAW TIMES shorn of its usual commentaries upon matters relating to Magistrates' Law. This is, however, the less to be regretted, since legitimate subjects for discussion have been scant, no question of interest having arisen for some weeks past. We hope shortly to resume th running notes on this branch of practice.

THE LAWYER.

Summary.

AT this dull season we have nothing to note, save the numerous elections of legal udges for the local courts, in accordance with the provisions of the Small Debts Act. Advertisements to this effect will be found in our columns, and we hear that many more are contemplated. Half of our readers are engaged in the railway speculations. May we ask those of them who have the power to send their prospectuses to the LAW TIMES? Where could they find a better medium for advertisements addressed to the wealthy than in a journal which has been made the medium for the publication of sales of property, and which is therefore generally looked to for such announcements

The following abstract of the provisions of Mr. HAWES's Bill for the amendment of the Law of Bankruptcy and Insolvency is taken from the Times. We extract it because it will interest the Profession to learn what are the views of mercantile men upon this branch of legislation. But the Law of Debtor and Creditor must not thus be tinkered by amateur jurists. It must be dealt with as one large subject by the Government, and codified. By no lesser means can it be adapted to the altered wants and views of society:—

All alterations in the laws relating to bankruptcy and insolvency are of erious importance in our trading community, that we lose no time in inviting attention to the provisions of the bill introduced by Mr. Hawes and Mr. Masterman shortly before the closing of the session, and which has just been printed. The object of the Bill, as stated in the preamble, is to afford a greater protection to creditors.

By the Bankruptcy Act of 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 122), it was requisite that, in order to bring a trader before the Court, he should have been personally served with an account in writing of the particulars of the creditor's demand, and a notice requiring payment in the form described by the Act. In lieu of this, the present Bill proposes to simplify the form of particulars of demand and of notice, and also to dispense with the necessity of personal service, allowing the demand and notice to be left at the trader's last known place of abode, or to be sent to him by post. The following is the new form:—

"SCHEDULE (A).

"Account of Particulars of Demand and Notice requiring payment.

"[Here copy the account.]

"Mr. A. B. [Insert trader's name and place of business or residence.]

"The above account being due, you are requested immediately to pay the same to, &c.

"C. D.

"[Insert the name of the creditor, or of the firm under which he is trading, and his place of business or residence.]"

Under the existing law, the trader has the power to stop the proceedings by a deposition on oath that he verily believes he has a good defence to the demand. It is true he must do this at his peril, and under the liabilities of the consequences of perjury; but it does not follow that, because one jury might negative his defence, another jury should convict him of not having been sincere in his belief of its validity. The new Bill proposes to transfer the decision of this matter of opinion to the Court of Bankruptcy, and the third section empowers the Court to require the trader "to prove to the satisfaction of the Court, by other means, in addition to a deposition upon oath, in writing, under his hand, that he has a good defence to such demand, or to some and what part thereof." If he fails to do this, the Court may take charge of his property, and may place a person upon his premises for its safe keeping, according to the provisions of the fourth section:—

"And be it enacted, that if any trader so summoned as aforesaid shall not come before such Court within four days from the date of the said summons (having no lawful impediment made known to and proved to the satisfaction of the Court, at the said time, and allowed); or if any such trader, upon his appearance to such summons as aforesaid, or at any enlargement or adjournment thereof (as the case may be), shall not prove to the satisfaction of the Court, in manner hereinbefore mentioned, that he has a good defence to the demand of such creditor, it shall be lawful for the said Court, upon the request of any such creditor, and upon proof being given to the satisfaction of such Court of the validity of his demand, and of the delivery or the leaving of such summons, and that fourteen days have elapsed since the delivery of the aforesaid account and notice, to issue a warrant in the form specified in schedule B hereunto annexed, directing a person, to be named by such creditor, and approved by the Court; and such person is hereby empowered to enter the place of abode or business, warehouse or other premises, of such trader, and to take such charge of the goods, securities, moneys, and property thereupon, as shall prevent the removal thereof from the said premises, unless a correct account shall be kept and rendered to him, if required, of the person to whom and the place to which the ame are respectively about to be removed; and also to require a daily account to be kept of all the moneys which shall be received and paid by such trader; and such person shall continue on the said premises until the fifteenth day from the day of appearance named in the said summons, or such enlarged time as may be granted by the said Court in that behalf, unless such trader shall have before such last-mentioned day paid, secured, or compounded for the demand of such creditor to his satisfaction, or have entered into a bond, with two sureties, to be approved by the said Court, to pay such sum as shall be recovered in any action which may have been brought or may thereafter be brought for recovery of the same, together with such costs as shall be given in such action."

The sixth section of the Bill gives the Court a discretion to suspend or withdraw its protection from arrest at any time; and the seventh section positively requires the withdrawal of this protection, when the bankruptcy or insolvency has arisen from fraud, wilful misconduct, extravagance, or gambling, or if there has been concealment of property or fraudulent assignment thereof, or if there has been any falsification of accounts or obtaining credit by false pretences. By section the eighth the assignees and creditors are enabled to sue out execution against the bankrupt or insolvent at once on the withdrawal of protection, their debts being put upon the footing of judgments.

The twelfth and following sections make provision for the registering of bills of sale, agreements, and mortgages on goods. It is not imperative that all such transfers should be registered, but, unless they are registered within twenty-one days of their execution, they are to have no effect as against the assignees, and the assignees are to be entitled to recover for the use of the creditors the goods or their value. The memorial of the mortgage on the goods, bill of sale, or agreement, is to be registered with the Senior Master of the Court of C non Pleas, who is to be allowed 7s. for the entry ach memorial upon his register, and for every search of such register, the sum of 1s. The memorial must be signed by one of the parties to the deed, bill of sale, mortgage, or agreement, and must be attested by the witness who attested the execution of the original document; and this witness must attend the Master (or his deputy), and prove on oath the signing of the memorial and the execution of the original document or instrument of transfer. The mode of registry is pointed out in the 15th section:—

contain the date of such deed, bill of sale, mortgage, or agreement, and the names and additions of all the parties and witnesses to the same, and the places of their abode, and shall specify the goods, chattels, and effects contained therein, and the place where the same shall be, as the same are specified in such deed, bill of sale, mortgage, or agreement; and that every such deed, bill of sale, mortgage, or agreement, shall be produced to the said Master, or his deputy, at the time of registering such memorial, who shall indorse and sign a certificate upon every such deed, bill of sale, mortgage, or agreement, of the day and time on which such memorial is so registered, expressing also in what book, page, and number the same is registered; which certificate shall be taken as evidence of such registry in all courts of record whatsoever; and that every page of such register-books, and every memorial that shall be entered therein, shall be mentioned, and the year, month, and time of day when every such memorial is registered shall be entered in such books and on such memorial; and that such Master, or his deputy, shall duly file every such memorial, in order of time as the same shall be brought to him, and register the same in the order in which they shall respectively come to his hands; and that the said register-books shall be open to inspection by every person requiring to search the same."

The Bill also contains a provision for the distribution of the effects of a deceased trader, if no executor, administrator, or personal representative appears; and the Court is empowered to authorize a person to enter upon the premises, take charge of the effects, and distribute them in like manner as if a fiat of bankruptcy had issued.

Before the reassembling of Parliament there is ample opportunity for all parties interested to express their opinions, or offer suggestions to the gentlemen who have introduced the Bill upon all or any of its provisions, as well as to convey their sentiments to their representatives, whether in its favour or against it.

The following temperate letter appears in the Morning Herald.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE MORNING HERALD.

Sir,—I seldom remember so much unanimity, or greater perseverance, in the newspaper press, as that which it has shewn in the one-sided controversy which it has lately carried on with the Bar. The indignant assertion of their own claims which the London journalists have put forth has been echoed by the provincial papers, and even taken up, with a total ignorance of the question at issue, by the French pre[ss] [u]ntil editors and reporters seem to have [convinced themselves, as they have no doubt convinced the] public, that a part of the Bar has declared, in the words quoted by you from the Morning Post, "that it is a very disgraceful thing" for a barrister "to be in any way connected with the London press." I am induced by the strong language which you have used in an article on the subject in your paper of Thursday, the 18th instant, to call your attention to the real state of the case. I should certainly not think of appealing to the ear[s] [or] fairness of the Times, a paper, which, by its conduct on this and on much more important occasions, has shewn that it is a disgrace to the press to which it belongs, and to the country which supports it. It would be less absurd, even, to apply to its servile followers, down to the simple and credulous Punch, who week after week repeats with implicit faith the statements of its versatile leader, for the purpose of deducing from them some well-meant moral of cockney sentiment or cockney politics. It seems to me, however, that the Morning Herald, and some other journals, have been actuated in their conduct by a jealousy for the honour of their own profession, which would be justifiabl[e] [o]r laudable if the occasion called for it. It is not without reason that I have called the dispute one-sided. The Press asserts that the repudiation of any connection with it by certain circuits is offensive and insulting. I have nothing to say to the contrary, except that the repudiation never took place. Any member of any circuit is still at liberty to edit, or write for, or report for any newspaper with which he may think proper to connect himself. Neither the Bar nor any part of it has assumed any right to control him. The Oxford Circuit determined that no member of the bar mess should report the circuit proceedings, not because reporting was a degrading occupation, but solely because it was considered undesirable that friends, rivals, opponents, and daily companions, should have the power of dispensing to each other publicity and its real or supposed advantages. Not only unfairness was to be guarded against, but, much other cases assume the duties, the newspaper reporters, who, I believe, are perfectly competent to undertake it, although from some strange misconception they now consider themselves insulted by the preference. There was, however, a natural unwillingness to disturb a long-continued arrangement, which might have led probably to entire inaction in the matter, if it had not been for the well-known conduct of the Times in garbling its reports, and meeting the remonstrances of its own injured reporter by a letter to him from the editor, filled with such vulgar insolence to the circuit, that it was evident that in future any connection with the Times must be at the expense of discontinuing any connection with the Circuit Bar. The disagreeable feeling which had been excited strengthened the general impression that it was better for the future to remove all responsibility for circuit reports from the Bar to the professional reporters, a measure adopted without a motive or an expression which need have given offence to the most sensitive member of the public press. The Bar resigned the office of reporting, not as below their rank, but as inconvenient with reference to their relation to one another, just as they have subjected themselves to restrictions with reference to their modes of travelling and living when on circuit, which certainly involve no imputation either on coach proprietors or innkeepers, and no assumption of superiority over those who travel in coaches and sleep at inns. If a body of directors were to resolve that their proceedings should be reported only by professional reporters, it would surely be considered rather a proper security against partiality and one-sidedness, than an undue assumption of superiority. The resolution of the Oxford Circuit stands on exactly similar grounds. After this resolution was passed, the London press for some months almost unanimously reprobated the fraudulent malignity of the Times; and it was not till the Oxford Circuit adopted the painful, but necessary, and indeed merely formal measure, of excluding from its body, in pursuance of the existing rule, two gentlemen who had thought fit to fill the vacancies left by the resignation of the former reporters, that the press in general attacked the Bar. Yet the course adopted by the Circuit was unavoidable, and quite unconnected with the merits of the rule, which must equally have been enforced if it had been intended to rescind it the next day. I do not know the exact terms of the resolution adopted by the Western Circuit; but I have good reason to know that it was founded on exactly similar grounds. It is singular that the same rule has been established for many years on the Home Circuit without exciting the indignation of the press. Much sentiment has been wasted on the hardship inflicted on young and deserving barristers, by the withdrawal of their means of support a consideration not very important to the Profession, when the small salary attached to the office can only be received by two or three individuals out of a body of from 100 to 200. I wish, however, to leave the controversy as I found it—one-sided. The Press has a perfect right to discuss the wisdom of the rule. The Bar, I think, will not take part in the discussion. I am not, however, without some hope that the respectable and rational portion of the press will, if they find it desirable to assert their own rank and claims, abstain from accusing a portion of the Bar of having either treated those claims with contumely, or shewn the bad taste to assert any comparative position on their own behalf. I inclose my name and address (which, however, I do not wish to have published), and remain,

Your obedient servant,

Sept. 20, 1845. A. B.

We also extract from the Times a letter containing a very just complaint.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TIMES.

Sir,—Will you do me the favour of calling attention, through the medium of your columns, to the following case, in order that before next long vacation some one may be found to take steps with a view to remedying the system of which I complain?

Having this morning received instructions to sign a judgment on a judge's order due last Saturday, and to issue execution immediately for the amount, as the defendant was in the act of making away with his property, and the writ going down by to-night's post was the only means of making it available, I hastened to comply with my instructions, but, on presenting myself at the Master's office to get my costs taxed, I was informed that there was no Master in attendance, and, further, that there would not be one until the 24th of October. I must therefore issue my execution for the amount of the debt alone (which personal remedy against his debtor, is fated also to lose his remedy against his goods. Surely, Sir, this is not according to either law or justice. But where is the remedy? Perhaps one of your readers will inform me. Apologizing for trespassing on your valuable space, I am, Sir, yours obliged,

A Solicitor

PRACTICAL NOTES.—No. V.

DISABILITIES OF OUTLAWS.

It falls naturally within the scope of our Series of Practical Notes to notice any qualifications of old-established principles, introduced by recent decisions, although the necessity of this knowledge may not be of very frequent occurrence. We therefore wish now to draw attention to the legal disabilities of outlaws. So recently as the case of Aldridge v. Buller (2 M. & W. 412), Lord Abinger said—"The principle is clearly laid down in the authorities that an outlaw cannot appear in court for any purpose but to reverse his outlawry. That is a rule so long settled that we ought not now, for the first time, to create exceptions to it." And Lord Denman, C.J. in the subsequent case of Hamlin v. Crossley (8 Ad. & El. 677); Reg. v. Insolvent Debtors Court (3 Nev. & P. 513), spoke of in numerous cases and text-books." We shall, however, presently shew that more recent cases have materially qualified this rule; but first of all we may briefly refer to the old authorities upon it. It has sometimes been said that originally an outlaw might be put to death by any man, because he had "caput lupinum." Thus, in the Mirror, cap. 6, sect. 4, we have the following curious passage:—

Utlage pur felonie teigne leu pur loup, et est criable woolfeshered, pur ceo que loup est beast haye de touts gents, et de ceo en urant list al ascun de le occider al foer del loup, dont custome solont estre de porter les testes al chiefe lieu del county, ou de la fraunchise et solont la avoire demy mark del countie pur chescun teste de utlage et de loupe.

But it has been often overlooked that this applied solely to outlaws for felony, punishable by death, who were looked upon as guilty because they would not stand their trial, upon the same principle that those who refused to plead were liable to the peine forte et dure. It does not, however, appear that an outlaw in a civil action was ever considered "caput lupinum;" and the lives even of felon-outlaws were protected by statute in the reign of Edward the Third.

Glanvil says, "Utlagatus legem terræ amittit," and Britton "Respondra a touts, mais nul respondra a luy." These are passages often quoted, and it follows from them that an outlaw cannot sue in any court. But where he is only the nominal plaintiff, or where he sues en auter droit as executor or administrator, the disability ceases. (Bac. Abridg. Outlaw, D. 4.) But it attaches even where the King is interested in the suit, as in a qui tam action (Atkins v. Baylis, 2 Mod. 267), for the plaintiff would receive a portion of the penalty.

The extent of this disability was much considered in Loukes v. Holbeach (4 Bing. 419). There, in accordance with the established principle, and the case of Griffith v. Middleton (Cro. Jac. 425), an outlaw was held as incapable of taking advantage of the law through the medium of a rule to shew cause as by an actual suit. The defendant had been outlawed in an action for the arrears of an annuity, and then sought to set aside the annuity; and Mr. Justice Park delivered the judment of the Court at some length, and concluded as follows:—

But it is said that persons, by coming in, may be put to great personal inconvenience, even to imprisonment. With that we can have nothing to do. We think, as matters are now situated, the applicant has no locus standi in judicio, except for one purpose; and as this applicant has not that purpose in view, therefore this rule must be discharged.

We are not aware of any case in which this was infringed upon or qualified prior to Hawkins v. Hall; for Castelman's case (4 Bur. 2119); Dixon execution for the costs of nonsuit. But, in Hawkins v. Hall (1 Beav. 73), an important qualification was grafted upon this rule, supposed to be so clear and explicit. The facts were, that the plaintiff's bill having been dismissed with costs, which were taxed at the sum of 161*l*. 18s. a subpœna for costs to that amount was issued against him, and he was served with the subpœna, and demand for payment was made upon him at Boulogne, out of the jurisdiction of the Court. The plaintiff afterwards came to England, and was subsequently arrested under the attachment, and, being in custody, several detainers were lodged against him. Three days afterwards a motion was made to set aside the attachment and discharge the plaintiff. It was objected that the plaintiff, being an outlaw and in contempt, could not be heard in a court of justice. The Master of the Rolls admitted the principle, but held that a complaint of irregular proceedings was not within its scope, and that an outlaw is entitled to the benefit of the law for his personal protection.

In consequence of this decision, various motions have been made by outlaws, and exceptions to the old principle established. In Walker v. Thellusson (1 D. N. S. 277), Wightman, J. held that an outlaw arrested on a ca. sa. issued upon a judgment more than a year old, and not revived by scire facias, was entitled to set aside the ca. sa.; and Williams, J. in a subsequent proceeding between the same parties, supported this view, on the ground that an effort of an outlaw to recover his personal liberty was not an enforcement of a right, but a matter purely defensive. He was therefore entitled to set aside a scire facias which did not recite a previous scire facias on the same judgment, although it had not been returned and filed. (Ib. 578.)

Now, undoubtedly, a distinction may be suggested between these cases and that of Loukes v. Holbeach, and it may be said, that these are exceptions in favour of the liberty of the subject. And this seems to have occurred to Patteson, J. in Byrne v. Manning (2 D. N.S. 403). There it became unnecessary to decide whether an outlaw could set aside a warrant of attorney and judgment thereon, because it appeared, that when the motion was made, he had not been outlawed; and as the application was in respect of the very same debt as the outlawry, the defendant was allowed to be heard to support the motion, which he was clearly entitled to make in the first instance. And that very learned judge said, "If Hawkins v. Hall is distinguishable from the case of Loukes v. Holbeach, very well; but if it is meant to overrule that case, it certainly would require some consideration before I decide by which I should be bound."

But a reference to the passage quoted above from the judgment in Loukes v. Holbeach will shew, that even the distinction suggested in favour of personal liberty was plainly brought to the minds of the judges; and the language there used is against any such distinction. If, therefore, the cases had rested here, we might still doubt whether Hawkins v. Hall would be supported. But two other cases have occurred which support the exception, that in matters purely defensive, and to protect himself from irregular proceedings, and claims which have not a legal foundation, an outlaw may be heard.

In Davis v. Trevanion (14 L. J. 138, Q. B.; 4 Law T. 341) an outlaw had obtained a rule calling on the plaintiff to shew cause why the judgment, signed upon a warrant of attorney, and a scire facias issued to revive the judgment, should not be set aside, on the ground that the warrant of attorney, which had been executed in France, was not duly attested under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. Wightman, J. held that the statute applied to all warrants of attorney sought to be enforced in this country, and that the application could be made by an outlaw. The personal liberty of the outlaw was not here immediately in issue, and the distinction before suggested is therefore so far unsupported. Again, in Re Mander (Prac. Cas. Ver. Rep.130, 4 Law T. 355), the full Court of Queen's Bench, while deciding that an outlaw could not take the initiative step of referring a bill to taxation under 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, yet intimated their opinion that, if an action was brought without any previous taxation, then he might be heard on motion. The difference is clear, for non constat that any improper claim would be made; and a reference to taxation would not be a defensive proceeding, but an initiative proceeding merely to protect himself by the machinery of the law from a claim which may hereafter be made. To have allowed this, would have been a still greater infringement upon the old principle than the cases of Hawkins v. Hall and the others commented upon. That exception, however, we now consider established; and as no distinction can be suggested between Loukes v. Holbeach and Davis v. Trevanion, the former case must be held to be overruled.

Before concluding this article, we would observe that Somers v. Holt (8 D. P. C. 506) must not be looked upon as a conclusive authority that the objection of the plaintiff's outlawry could be taken in any other way than by a plea in abatement. There the defendant in an action for libel did not know of the plaintiff's outlawry till after plea pleaded and notice of trial; and the Court under these circumstances, after verdict, reluctantly granted a rule to stay proceedings. The rule was not argued, as the outlawry was reversed. Several authorities were cited, and it was said to be in the nature of a plea in bar; but the following passage in Co. Litt. 128 b. was not quoted, and it would seem to have been conclusive against the application.

If the ground or the cause of the action be forfeited by the outlawry, then may the outlawry be pleaded in barre in the action, as in actions of debt, detinue, &c. But in real actions or personal, where damages be uncertain (as in trespass, of battery, of goods, of breaking his close, and the like), and are not forfeted by the outlawry, their outlawry must be pleaded in disability of the person. MORAL OBLIGATION—HOW FAR A CONSIDERATION.

The next case is that of Mitchenson v. Hewson (7 T. R. 349); and here the question of moral obligation is introduced by counsel arguendo, and not disputed by the Court, whose judgment is, however, very brief, and given, for ought that appears, upon other grounds.

We now come to the case of Atkins v. Banwell and Another (2 East, 505), which was an action against the overseers of the parish of Toddington for the care of a pauper, founded on an implied promise, and a nonsuit was entered on the ground of there being no express promise. Watson v. Turner (Bull. N.P. 129, 147, 281), where an apothecary recovered against parish officers for cure of a pauper on a special promise to pay, was cited by counsel. Lord Ellenborough said—"That last circumstance makes all the difference. A moral obligation is a good consideration for an express promise, but it has never been carried further, so as to raise an implied promise in law."

In the note to Derbyshire v. Parker (6 East, 16), the case of Hopes v. Alder (Mich. 40 G. 3, B. R.) is quoted, where the defence was want of notice to dishonour; but it appeared that, after the bill became due, the defendant said he would see it paid. Gibbs, for defendant, admitted that this promise was decisive. The case of Lundie v. Robertson (7 East, 236) is precisely similar, which was an action against the indorser of a bill, and the same defence as in the last case, but a subsequent promise to pay. Defendant held liable, and a similar case, decided by Lord Raymond, is quoted in the notes, viz. Haddock v. Bury (Trin. 3 G. 2, MS. Burnet, J.)

We come to the case of Wennall v. Adney (3 Bos. & P. 217), where a master was held not liable, upon an implied assumpsit, to pay for medical attendance on a servant who had met with an accident in his service. The very learned note of the reporters of this case is well worthy of perusal, more especially as the doctrines there laid down have since received the sanction of judicial authority (see Eastwood v. Kenyon, 3 P. & D. 282; 11 A. & E. 438), and appear to us to give a very clear and satisfactory statement of the law as to moral obligations. Their conclusions have been already alluded to, and have not been in the slightest degree affected by subsequent decisions.

In Lamb v. Bruce (1 M. & S. 275) the doctrine of moral obligation was alluded to, but Lord Ellenborough thought the case might be decided on another ground, viz. that the defendant had done that which was in law equivalent to a previous request. We shall next advert to the case of Wing v. Mill (1 B. & A. 104), where it was decided that, where a pauper, residing in the parish of A, received, during illness, a weekly allowance from the parish of B, where he was settled: Held, that an apothecary who had attended the pauper might maintain an action on his bill against the overseers of B, who expressly promised to pay. Lord Ellenborough says—"In this case both the legal and moral obligation prevail."

Tomlinson v. Bentall (5 B. & C. 738) does not in any degree invalidate our position, for there were circumstances in this case which amounted to an express previous authority from defendants for plaintiff (an apothecary) to attend the patient; but the doctrine propounded by Bayley, J. in this case may be open to some dispute. He says, "I do not put the case upon the ground of moral obligation (it was not a case coming under that category), or upon the ground of the constable having sent for and employed plaintiff: but I put it upon the ground that the law imposed a legal obligation upon the parish officers of Heybridge to employ a surgeon for the cure of the pauper." Now there is a legal obligation to pay taxes; but if A were to go and voluntarily pay the taxes of B, we doubt much whether that fact alone could make B the debtor of A; at all events, the overseers would not have been liable, in the absence of an express promise, if they had reasonable ground for believing that the pauper was provided for, or there was no possibility of his being otherwise cured. Thus in Urmston v. Newcombe (4 A. & E.), it is a question whether a father deserting an infant child is liable for necessaries supplied to it, there being no further proof of a contract.

The case of Littlefield v. Shee (2 B. & Ad.) has been already adverted to, and we shall satisfy ourselves by referring the reader to the following case, reported in 3 G. & D. viz. Eastwood v. Kenyon, decided by the Court of Queen's Bench; and we do so the more readily, inasmuch as many cases on the subject are there quoted which (because they are there cited) we have hitherto designedly omitted, and, although this case might, on a casual perusal, appear to militate against our position, yet we hope to shew that in fact it confirms and strengthens us. The declaration stated that plaintiff had expended money in maintaining an infant and improving her property, and for that purpose borrowed a sum of money of another, to whom he had given his promissory note; that the infant, after she came of age and before her marriage, promised payment, and that defendant, her husband, who had derived a benefit from the expenditure, promised plaintiff to pay the note, and had not done so. Motion was made in arrest of judgment, on the ground that there was no sufficient consideration for the promise. Lord Denman says, "Most of the older cases on this subject (moral obligation) are collected in a learned note to the case of Wennall v. Adney, and the conclusion there arrived at seems to be correct in general." The learned judge then cites, as instances of the doctrine, the case of confirmation of contracts by infants—debts of bankrupts revived by subsequent promise after certificate. He then proceeds to examine the case of Barnes v. Hedley (2 Taunt. 184), which decided that a promise to pay a sum of money with legal interest, which sum had been originally lent on usurious terms, but in taking the account of which all usurious items had been by agreement struck out, was binding. Again, Lee v. Muggridge (5 Taunt. 36) upheld an assumpsit by a widow, that her executors should pay a bond given by her while covert, to secure money then advanced to a third person at her request. The Chief Justice goes on to observe,

It is remarkable that in none of these cases was there any allusion made to the learned note in 3 Bos. & P. which has been very generally thought to contain a correct statement of the law. With this doctrine Lee v. Muggridge must be allowed to be decidedly at variance. It should be observed, however, that there was in that case an actual request during coverture, though one not binding in law; and though the grounds of decision in the above case were equally applicable to Littlefield v. Shee, yet Lord Tenterden, in the latter case, dissented from Lee v Muggridge." His lordship then goes on to animadvert against the too great extension of the doctrine of moral obligation, and then proceeds to hold the declaration to be bad, as shewing a "consideration executed long before, and yet not laid to have been at defendant's request, and disclosing nothing more than a voluntary benefit conferred. The subsequent assent of defendant could not be a ratihabitio, since he was in no way connected with the property when the money was expended. If the ratification of the wife when sole was relied on, then a debt from her would have been shewn, and defendant could not have been charged in his own right without some further consideration, as forbearance after marriage." He concludes by saying that, "the doctrine of moral obligation does not make its appearance till the time of Lord Mansfield, and then under circumstances not inconsistent with the ancient doctrine, when properly explained."

Now we conceive that Eastw[illegible]d v. Kenyon is an authority rather in our favour than against us, and, taking the objections raised by the Court in that case to be conclusive against the declaration, we may well infer that, had it been framed otherwise, the doctrine of moral obligation would have been distinctly, as it is in effect, admitted by the Court. The declaration, being special, ought certainly to have stated the consideration to have been at defendant's request, otherwise no valid consideration could have appeared on the face of it; but even that would not have cured the defect; for as a right of action accrued to plaintiff against the wife while sole, immediately on her express ratification of the expenditure the action should not have been against the husband in his own right, but the husband and wife should have been joined, there not appearing to have been any consideration so as to charge him alone. The doctrine of ratihabitio of course would not apply, because there could have been, by no possibility, a mandatum from defendant at the time of the original contract, and the law will not infer what is impossible—nemo tenetur ad impossibile.

Had, then, the declaration been grounded on a suit against husband and wife, on a ground of action which had accrued to plaintiff against the wife dum sola, the plaintiff might, as we conceive, have declared with the common counts, and given the wife's subsequent ratification in evidence, just as, in an action against an infant, who, after age has ratified a contract entered into when under age, the pleader invariably declares with a common count, and if infancy be pleaded, replies the ratification (1 M. & S. 721; 3 M. & S. 481.) Here, then, the doctrine of ratihabitio would apply, the mandatum being a possible supposition, arising from the fact of the wife being privy to the proceedings, and interested in them from the very first. We hope we have now shewn from the judgment itself the true grounds for the decision of Eastwood v. Kenyon, and that it does not at all invalidate our general argument as to the doctrine now in question. Williams v. Paul (6 Bing. 653), where goods were bought on a Sunday, in contravention of 29 Car. 2, c. 7, s. 1, and the purchaser afterwards, while they were in his possession, promised to pay for them, it was held that the seller might recover on a quantum meruit, is another authority for our position.

We will lastly proceed to examine Mr. Selwyn's assertion, that of the doctrine of moral obligation not a trace is to be found in the older cases, backed, as at first view it appears, by Lord Denman's [illegible]mark, "that it does not appear till the time of Lord Mansfield, and then under circumstances not inconsistent with the ancient doctrine when properly explained." Now, if Mr. Selwyn means the same as the Court of Queen's Bench, we admit the correctness of his position, and agree with him. We admit that the te[illegible] [illegible]al obligation" does not occur till Lord Mansfield's time, but the principle (and terms are nothing [illegible] themselves) is, when properly explained, as old as our law itself, and for this proper explanation we refer to and adopt the note in Wennall v. Adney, with the judgment in Eastwood v. Kenyon to support it. We claim no more latitude, nor do we believe that Lord Mansfield himself ever thought of the doctrine otherwise than as thus restricted. This [illegible] moral obligation," so explained, is, we repeat, [illegible] antiquity. The confirmation by an infa[illegible] of his contracts, after full age; by a bankrup[illegible] of his debts, barred by certificate; of a subsequ[illegible] express promise to pay a physician his fees, are [illegible] former a very old, the latter more modern instan[illegible] principle, though the two last [illegible] found [illegible] same ground as the former, and [illegible] equally illustrative of the antiquity of the doctrine. The principle is further illustrated in Thornton v. Illing-worth (2 B. & C. 826), per Bayley, J. "If he makes a promise after he comes of age, that binds him, on the ground of his taking upon himself a new liability, upon a moral consideration existing before."

The apparent discouragement which in [illegible] sions has been given to the principle which has been the subject of our discussion has, we fear, deterred many from its due application within legitimate bounds; but if we bear well in mind the case of Wennall v. Adney, and remember that an express subsequent promise is sufficient to revive what would have been of itself a sufficient consideration without such promise, were it not for the intervention of some rule of law, and that such subsequent promise requires (unlike cases which would not have been so enforceable) no new consideration to support it, we shall gain no inconsiderable advantage from the rule, and encounter none of the mischiefs apprehended by the Court of Queen's Bench in Eastwood v. Kenyon as likely to arise from its too unguarded adoption and application to facts not strictly within its scope. We may here conveniently add, that, in the recent case of Kirkpatrick v. Tattersall (reported in 11 Law Journal, p. 7, Ex.), the Court held that a debt due from a bankrupt which would be barred by certificate is a good consideration for a promise by the bankrupt to pay it, whether the promise be before or after certificate; the promise must, however, be in writing, and distinct, and must bind the person, and not the estate—a mere acknowledgment, though implying a promise, is insufficient, as it would amount only to an account stated.

LEADING CASES.—No. XII.

Gore v. Gibson.

(13 M. & W. 623.)

Drunkenness, whether an excuse for a crime—Under what circumstances it avoids a contract.

According to the law of England, drunkenness is no excuse for the commission of a crime. As for a drunkard," says Sir E. Coke, "who is voluntarius dæmon, he hath no privilege thereby; but what hurt or ill soever he doth, his drunkenness doth aggravate it - omne crimen ebrietas et incendit et detegit." And in the 4th Book of Sir William Blackstone's Commentaries, p. 25, we find it laid down that our law looks upon intoxication as an aggravation of any crime committed whilst under its influence, rather than as an excuse for any criminal misbehaviour. So in Beverley's case (4 Rep. 125), wh[illegible] the liability of persons non compotes mentis [illegible]sidered, the same rule is mentioned in these words: "Although he who is drunk is for the time non compos mentis, yet his drunkenness does not extenuate his act or offence, nor turn to his avail; but it is a great offence in itself, and therefore aggravates his offence, and doth not derogate from the act which he did during that time," &c. And, lastly, we may refer to the authority of Lord Bacon in support of the same principle: "If," he observes, "a madman commit a felony, he shall not be excused because his imperfection came by his own default." (Bac. Works, vol. 4, p. 36.) The Roman law seems in some measure to have differed from our own with regard to the degree of punishment which should be inflicted for an offence committed by a drunken man. In the 48th Book of the Pandects, title XVI. sect. 6, § 7, in treating De Re Militari, and of the punishments to be enforced on soldiers for the purpose of preserving martial discipline, we find that great allowance was made for the vice of inebriety—per vinum lapsis capitalis pœna remittenda est—capital punishment shall not be inflicted on those who have committed an offence whilst under the influence of wine. And in Dr. Wood's Treatise on the Civil Law, 3rd edit. p. 265, after stating that by that law madmen could not be guilty of an offence, the learned author observes, that this excuse cannot extend to men drunk, because their acts are voluntary, and they themselves are the cause of their own misfortunes; but in some cases, if the circumstances allow it, a milder punishment may be inflicted; and again, at p. 287 [illegible] work, it is laid down, that "drunken[ness] may extenuate or excuse a verbal injury, if the offender does not get drunk on purpose, and is not [s]ensible of his abusive temper under that disorder."

It must not, however, be supposed that even in our own law, where an act of violence has been committed, the question whether the person committing it was at the time drunk or sober, is immaterial; on the contrary, it was observed by Patteson, J. in a recent case, that "although drunkenness is no excuse for any crime whatever, yet it is of very great importance in cases where it is a question of intention. A person may be so drunk as to be utterly unable to form any intention at all, and yet he may be guilty of very great violence." (Reg. v. Cruse, 8 C. & P. 546.) In like manner, where a question arises as to whether the accused was actuated by malice or not, it will in many cases be necessary for the jury to take into consideration the fact that the party was drunk at the time of committing the act alleged against him (see the cases collected 1 Russ. on Crimes, 3rd edit. 7, 8), and the verdict may be materially influenced by such consideration. In criminal cases, then, we may sum up the law thus—that drunkenness does not furnish any excuse for a crime, but is often material with reference to the intent with which the act charged as the offence was done.

In the case where a contract was entered into by a person in a state of drunkenness, it was formerly held that such contract was binding, and could not be subsequently invalidated by the party who had thus entered into it, according to a maxim laid down in Beverley's case already cited, and elsewhere, viz. that a person of full age shall not be allowed to stultify himself, and to gainsay his own act. But this maxim cannot with propriety be applied to the case under consideration; and the true principle which is now recognised by our law, and is manifestly consistent with reason, is that laid down by Pothier in his treatise on contracts (Traité des Obligations), pt. 1, c. 1, s. 1, art. 4, as follows:—"It is clear that drunkenness, when it exists to such a degree as to occasion a temporary loss of the reasoning powers, renders a person incapable of contracting whilst thus affected, because such affection renders him incapable of consenting." The principle here enunciated is based on sound philosophy, and seems, indeed, to follow at once from the definition usually given of the word "agreement, which is, aggregatio mentium, i.e. an assent of the will on either side to that which is the subject of the contract between the parties. This remark, however, is applicable to an express rather than an implied contract; and, as we shall presently see, a distinction may probably exist between the two species of contracts which should be considered before determining as to the liability of a party who has contracted during a state of intoxication.

In Pitt v. Smith (3 Camp. 33) the agreement which formed the groundwork of the action had been signed by a person whilst in a state of complete intoxication; and Lord Ellenborough held it to be void, observing that "such a person had no agreeing mind." (See also Fenton v. Holloway, 1 Stark. N. P. C. 126; Gregory v. Frazer, 3 Camp. 454.) And in the very recent case of Gore v. Gibson (13 M. &.W. 623), the same rule was adhered to, and the law on the subject under consideration very clearly explained. That was an action of assumpsit by the indorsee against the indorser of a bill of exchange. Plea, that before and at the time when the defendant indorsed the said bill of exchange, he was so drunken, intoxicated, and under the influence of liquor, and thereby so entirely deprived of sense, understanding, and the use of his reason, as to be unable to comprehend the meaning, object, nature, or effect of the said indorsement, or to contract or promise thereby, of all which premises the plaintiff before, and at the time when, he the defendant so indorsed the said bill of exchange, and always since, had full knowledge and notice; on demurrer to this plea, it was contended on behalf of the plaintiff, that it was no answer to the declaration for the defendant to say that he indorsed the bill when in a state of intoxication; but that to make the plea good, he ought to have shewn that the intoxication was procured by the plaintiff, or that he took advantage of it: and in support of this argument was cited the rule as laid down by Sir Joseph Jekyll, M. R. in Johnson v. Medlicott (3 P. Wms. 130, note A.), thus: "The having been in drink is not any reason to relieve any man against any deed or agreement gained from him when in those circumstances, for this were to encourage drunkenness; secus if through the management or contrivance of him who gained the deed, the party from whom such deed has been gained was drawn into drink." As observed, however, by Parke, B. in the course of the argument, neither the above nor the other authorities which were relied upon state the degree of drunkenness of the party who had contracted, and against whom a remedy was subsequently sought upon the contract. "If," observed the learned judge, "the party was only partially drunk, so that he nevertheless knew what he was about, equity would not relieve; but here the plea states that the defendant was so entirely deprived of the use of his reason that he could not comprehend the meaning or effect of the indorsement." Precisely to the same effect are the remarks of Pollock, C.B. who, in the first place, referred to the law as laid down in Chancellor Kent's Commentaries, p. 45, thus:—"Although formerly it was considered that a man should be liable upon a contract made by him when in a state of intoxication, on the ground that he should not be allowed to stultify himself, the result of the modern authorities is, that no contract made by a person in that state, when he does not know the consequences of his own act, is binding upon him." "This doctrine," continued the Lord Chief Baron, "appears to me to be in accordance with reason and justice. With regard, however, to contracts which it is sought to avoid on the ground of intoxication, there is a distinction between express and implied contracts. Where the right of action is grounded upon a specific distinct contract, requiring the assent of both parties, and one of them is incapable of assenting, in such a case there can be no binding contract; but in many cases the law does not require an actual agreement between the parties, but implies a contract from the circumstances; in fact the law itself makes the contract for the parties. Thus, in actions for money had and received to the plaintiff's use, or money paid by him to the defendant's use, the action may lie against the defendant even though he may have protested against such a contract. So a tradesman who supplies a drunken man with necessaries may recover the price of them, if the party keeps them when he becomes sober, although a count for goods bargained and sold would fail." "Here," observed Alderson, B. "the action is necessarily brought upon the contract itself, and when it is shewn that the contract by indorsement was made when the defendant was in such a state of drunkenness that he did not know what he was doing, and especially when it appears that the plaintiff knew it, I cannot doubt that the contract is void altogether." The general rule to which we have on this occasion thought it desirable to call attention is clearly enforced in the preceding extracts, and from them it seems likewise to result, first, that a man to whom necessaries are supplied whilst in a state of complete drunkenness will be liable, for the price of such necessaries, according to the general doctrine on which the law respecting necessaries depends, viz. that such contract is held valid because it is for the benefit of the party that he should obtain credit for necessaries; and, secondly, that when goods which do not come within the definition of necessaries are supplied under similar circumstances, the party to whom they are supplied may, on recovering his senses, repudiate the contract, and by so doing prevent that liability from attaching which he would clearly incur by keeping the goods. This latter proposition it was not, however, requisite for the Court of Exchequer to lay down in deciding the principal case, and the reader may, on that account, receive it with less confidence than the former.

A note of Gore v. Gibson may be made in Chitt. junr. on Contracts, 3rd edit. 110.

CRIMINAL LAW REPORT.

Where, however, the definition of an offence makes not simply an act, but the accomplishment of an act under specified limitations essential, it is also essential to the legal certainty of the charge that the act should be shewn to be so qualified, by allegations as to the means used, or other limitations, as to be included within the definition. Similar observations are applicable where not merely an act, but also a result from the act, is an essential part of the definition; and also to those where not merely a particular result, but the means by which it has been effected are also essential.

With respect to the mode of charging accessories before the fact, the first question which presents itself is, whether there ought to be any distinction as regards the degree of the offence? It seems to be impossible to make any. Then, as to the description of the offence, the main, and as it seems the only reason for charging the procurement or participation of the offence, specially, seems to be the giving to the party charged more accurate and circumstantial information as to the mode of participation intended to be proved. If this be essential to justice in case of felony, it must also be so in case of misdemeanor, and also on charges of treason. If no such distinction can justly be made, the question arises, whether, in all cases, the procurement should be specially charged, or the general allegation should be deemed to be sufficient. If the distinction were of easy practical application, it would, we think, be desirable to adopt it, in order to prevent the possibility of a party being misled by being induced to suppose that evidence would not be adduced to prove him to be a procurer or promoter of the crime, but only to shew him to be a principal in the first degree. The distinction is, however, attended with practical inconvenience; it is in many instances very difficult to determine whether a particeps criminis was an accessory before the fact or a principal in the second degree. The adoption of this restriction would, consequently, be attended with danger of a failure of justice; were a special allegation necessary, the grand jury might in such cases come to one conclusion, the petty jury to another, and the criminal might escape altogether. There seem to be three modes of obviating these difficulties; by admitting the general charge to be sufficient, but requiring the prosecutor, on application by the accused, and under the direction of the Court, to supply the accused with the names of the principals in the first degree, and such particulars as should be necessary with a view to his defence; or, secondly, by allowing the charge to be stated in both ways, by means of different counts; thirdly, by allowing the charge to be made in the alternative.

With a view to the objects of identity and notice, circumstantial description of the time and place of doing the act, with a description of the particular persons or things so appertaining to the act as to constitute the offence, are obviously material. Such a description is conclusive as to identity, and complete as to notice, even although the act itself should be averred in general terms. It is plain, however, that to exact certainty of this description in allegation and proof would be inconvenient, and that strict compliance with the rule would often be impracticable. A grand jury or other tribunal of accusation may very frequently found the charge upon full conviction that a crime has been committed, and yet be unable, even after laborious exertion, to state all the circumstances of time, place, persons, and things with certainty. It seems to be plain, that such a tribunal ought not to be required to find that upon oath of which they may have had no evidence whatever.

The force of this observation, and the necessity for allowing great latitude to a grand jury in preferring their charge, is strongly illustrated by the instances of indictments for murder and robbery, which are valid although the jurors are unable to state, and allege their inability to state, the name of the party ered or robbed. And, independently of the mischief and absurdity of imposing such a restraint on justice as would result from treating an indictment as invalid because it did not contain particulars which the grand jury had no means of stating, or obliging them to state on oath matters of which they had no evidence, a further inconvenience would arise, even in cases where the grand jury had evidence to guide them, if proof were to be required of the particulars averred. It might, for instance, happen that a witness, in giving his evidence before a grand jury, might make a mistake as to the day, or even month, or year of the doing of the Act which he attested, and correct his testimony on the trial in chief. Whilst the requiring strict circumstantial certainty would be highly inconvenient, if not impracticable, to insist upon circumstantial certainty for mere form's sake, would be objectionable, not only as involving a mere show and pretence of certainty, which, as has already been observed, would be unworthy of the dignity of the law, but as tending to obstruct the course of justice by encouraging formal objections.

As the objects of circumstantial certainty are the identification and notification of the offence in fact, it is reasonable that any objection founded on any alleged defect of such certainty should be required to be made before any plea is pleaded to the merits, or at all events before the trial; for by pleading and going to trial without calling for further information, the accused declines to stand on the objection, and admits that the charge is sufficiently certain to enable him to plead and to defend himself on the trial. After conviction, circumstantial evidence is requisite principally in order to protect the offender against a second charge for the offence already expiated by punishment, and for this purpose the very evidence given on the trial of the first indictment must usually be more conclusive than any circumstantiality of statement on the face of the first indictment.

Where an indictment shews with sufficient certainty and precision that an offence has been committed if the allegations be true, but be defective in some point of mere circumstantial description, it is neither reasonable nor convenient that the whole proceeding should fail when the defect can be supplied from certain sources and means of information which the jurors who found the indictment did not possess. It is for this purpose useful to recognise the distinction between legal and circumstantial certainty: to allow additions, even on oath, to be made with a view to the former object, would be, in truth, to charge a new offence, at least to make a charge not before made, to allow further particulars as to a charge already made, would be free from any such objection; it would be to afford to the accused the information of the want of which he complains, and which may tend to his advantage, not only by affording him better means of defence, but also of protecting him against a second charge, at the least possible sacrifice of time and expense. This proposed alteration is not, it may be observed, a mere innovation; according to the existing law, circumstances which may be necessary for the purposes alluded to are, in some cases, required to be stated in particulars supplied by the prosecutor.

From such considerations the following inferences appear to be deducible:—

That grand juries ought to find no circumstances which are not warranted by the evidence.

That they should find such circumstances as may be material with a view to identify and notify the offence.

That with these objects, and subject to this condition, a very considerable degree of latitude ought to be allowed to a grand jury in affording such a degree of circumstantial certainty as the nature of the case may admit of.

That for this purpose such circumstances as afford approximations to certainty should not be excluded; and that although where it is certain that an offence has been committed, justice ought not to be defeated by mere uncertainty in circumstances, it is still desirable, with a view to the identifying and notifying the grounds of accusation, to make such reasonable approximation to certainty as the evidence will permit.

That the rule as to mere circumstantial certainty should be directory only.

That it s
direct particulars to be given.

That no objection on the mere ground of uncertainty in circumstantial description should be admitted after verdict

Where an offence is committed in respect of a written instrument, as in forging a note, or publishing a libel, it is a rule of convenience that the terms of the instrument should be stated, as by this means circumstantial certainty is best attained. Such particularity is not essential where, although a written instrument, such as a bond or note be a thing in respect of which the offence has been committed, as in case of theft, yet the particular words and expressions are not material to the offence.

The object of repeating the description of the same transaction in different counts is the avoiding of variances. The necessity for this arises from the condition imposed of stating particulars which cannot be known with certainty, and which frequently cannot be proved upon the trial, and, in some instances also, is referable to the uncertain state of the law as applicable to the particular transaction. The inconvenience arising from exacting so great a degree of particularity has been partially palliated by an Act (9 Geo. 4, c. 15), allowing amendments to be made in the indictment in order to adapt it to the evidence given. It appears to us that the principle and expediency of these remedies, or rather palliations, is very doubtful, and that the more simple and efficacious remedy would consist in permitting such a generality of description as would, with a moderate degree of attention, avoid the danger of variance, which is necessarily incident to a minute and formal detail of particulars.

The practice of multiplying counts is not only troublesome and expensive, but even inconsistent with a finding of the charge on oath, each count professing to be founded on a distinct transaction, although the evidence shew but one. The alteration of facts in a charge found on the oath of a grand jury, and then making that to appear as having been found which has not been so found, is also objectionable as being inconsistent with truth, and a departure pro tanto from principle.

We proceed to make a few observations on the inconvenience which has resulted from the practice of multiplying counts. The charge presented by a grand jury, in their mere statement on oath, is to be drawn by the officer of the Crown, but is more usually, in cases of difficulty, drawn by a skilful pleader. The legal practice of including several different charges in the same indictment gave rise to the admission of several charges apparently distinct, but in reality founded on the same transaction; and the practice, although, perhaps, not strictly warranted by the ancient and simple principles of the Criminal Law, or quite consonant with the duty of jurors, was sanctioned, no doubt, for the sake of its utility in excluding failures from variance in proof. The pleader, in making the most skilful use of his materials, with a view to conviction, has two main objects to attend to, the law which governs the case and the facts which are to be alleged. Supposing the law to be clear, he endeavours to satisfy it, at the least possible expense, in the allegation of facts necessary to shew a violation of the law. The less he alleges, the less danger is there of variance; he has therefore one or more counts, exceedingly sparing in allegation; but in order to avoid the danger of too strict an economy, other counts contain more liberal statements, oftentimes at the risk of inability to prove them. But, again, it often happens that there may be a doubt as to some material fact, in which case also, for the avoiding of variance, it may be necessary to state it in various modes. Counts then are multiplied, even when the law is clear, for the sake of avoiding any variance in fact. But the law itself may be uncertain; counts then are advisable—adapted to the simplest possible hypothesis in point of law, so as not to risk the necessity of having to prove too much; but this hypothesis may be erroneous, and therefore counts are also advisable to meet one, or more than one, of greater complexity. The course not unfrequently adopted by the pleader, to meet such difficulties in a complicated case is this,—to frame one count containing all the facts which can possibly be material, another exceedingly general and economical in the statement of fact; these being accomplished, intermediate counts are framed, varying as to the extent and manner of allegations, so as to suit the objects to which we have adverted. Such being the artificial manner in which, as we know from experience, indictments are constructed, it may sometimes be a matter of difficulty at an assizes or sessions to determine on which counts the verdict ought to be entered when such verdict is generally given. The criminal courts in which the judges of the superior courts have presided have lately adopted the precaution of passing a distinct sentence on each several count of the indictment, but so as not, in reality, to subject the party convicted to more than one penalty for the same actual offence. By this means, the danger of a total reversal of the judgment upon a writ of error, in case any count turned out to be insufficient, is avoided.

One inconvenience may (we make the observation with great deference) arise from the adoption of this course, that bad counts may possibly derive from it the sanction of legal judgment; further, that the practice encourages the insertion of a multiplicity of counts, and still leaves it doubtful on which the prosecutor really means to rely. There cannot, we apprehend, be any great difficulty in selecting the count on which the verdict might most safely be entered, when the verdict warrants such a selection. The exertion of that ingenuity which has suggested many counts, for the sake of avoiding variance from fact or deficiency in fact, can no longer be necessary when the power of selection is given by the verdict; and although the artist be not present who has skilfully provided against numerous contingencies, his opinion may be acted upon when the matter has been reduced to certainty.

When a verdict has been given, on which, of course, all facts stand proved or disproved, no apprehension on the score of variance in proof any longer exists; the only question, as regards selection, is, which of the established counts is safest in point of law. This can seldom be doubtful, for of two established counts, that which is most copious in fact must usually be best adapted to sustain the charge in point of law. If all the facts contained in such count be essential, the others which omit any of those facts must be bad in law, and though some of the facts in such count be superfluous, they do no harm.

Whilst the allowing a more general statement of an offence would greatly diminish the danger of variance in fact, and the more certain definition of offences would obviate the risk of failure from uncertainty as regards the law, we believe that the necessity for multiplying counts would be greatly diminished, if not altogether superseded, and therefore, that in case no objection should be allowable after verdict, except for want of legal certainty, there would be no difficulty in at once entering the verdict on a single count.

In conclusion of these observations, it may, we think, admit of doubt whether it be quite consistent with the character of the law for certainty, that so many sentences should be passed in respect of one and the same offence as agree with the number of counts which the special pleader has chosen to insert in the indictment, and that this should be done upon the ground that it does not appear which of them really charges such an offence as warrants the judgment. An indictment not unfrequently contains as many as a dozen counts, charging the facts of the same transaction differently. The passing twelve different sentences leaves it wholly uncertain for which of the twelve offences the defendant is really punishable, and the practice strongly indicates that the law is uncertain. A degree of laxity in the administration of criminal justice is thus sanctioned, which, to say the least, is not creditable to justice, and which tends much to increase an existing evil, by rendering laws already indefinite still more indefinite.

Whilst inconvenience results from having recourse to a multiplicity of counts for the purpose of avoiding an apprehended variance, nothing is gained from them with a view to real certainty. Mere formal particularity, not requiring any proof, is but an useless affectation of certainty; if proof be required, the multiplying formal and circumstantial descriptions does not make the charge in reality at all more certain, either in law or fact, than a single charge would have been, framed in terms sufficiently general to embrace all the variations of the charge. Though each distinct charge may appear to be more certain and precise, the accusation which the party is called upon to meet is not more certain. If, for instance, upon a charge founded on one transaction of taking a watch, an indictment contained three counts, one alleging the stealing of the watch of A, another alleging it to be the watch of B, and another stating it to be the property of C, the prisoner would only know that he was charged with stealing a watch, which it was proposed to prove to be the property either of A, or B, or C, and he would derive precisely the same information if the indictment contained but one charge of the taking of the watch, being the property of A, or B, or C. It is plain that the objection to alternative allegations, viz. that the charge is uncertain, is not at all removed by substituting alternative counts for alternative allegations in the same count.

The objection to amendments is still greater. If the substituted allegation be one which might have been included within some general allegation, no advantage in point of certainty is gained as regards the accused; for although a precise and particular allegation be used, yet if it may be changed at the trial to any other which might have been included under a more general count, he has not more efficient notice of the real charge than he would have possessed had the general allegation been used at first; if greater latitude were to be permitted, by allowing an allegation to be substituted although not included with that used under a general one, the charge would be less certain than it would have been if that general allegation had been used. Information to the defendant is not, however, the object of permitting such amendments when made at the trial; they are too late to serve the great object of circumstantial certainty,—that is, to notify to the accused the particular grounds of the charge: they are made to prevent the defeat of justice by a technical objection on the ground of variance from prescribed rules of technical description; in such case particularity of expression is not essential to the purposes of justice; it is therefore more consistent with reason and convenience to reject such a precise and unnecessary degree of precision, than to require it without any corresponding advantage, at the risk of misleading the party charged, and at the expense of passing laws to prevent that failure of justice which would otherwise result, and of the strange anomaly that new averments should be introduced on the record as sanctioned by the oath of a grand jury, when they have in fact been inserted at the discretion of the judge.

The general position, that the accused ought not to be convicted of any offence other than that charged by the grand jury, and expressed in the indictment, is plain and undeniable; it is therefore essential to determine what constitutes such identity. Two offences cannot be identical if the subject-matter or facts be different, or even if any one material and essential fact be different; on the other hand, there can be no inconvenience in distinguishing material facts or circumstances from such facts or descriptions as are unnecessary. There can be no difficulty in at once declaring that no variance in proof from the allegation of any superfluous or immaterial fact ought to be regarded as destructive of the identity of the charge. It is, however, apparent that such a variance from an essential fact or thing as shews that the alleged fact or thing is not that which is proved, must necessarily destroy the identity of the charge. If the prisoner were accused of robbing A B in a corn-field, in the parish of A, and the robbing were proved to have occurred in a meadow, the allegation might well be rejected, the variance being in respect of a merely superfluous and immaterial fact. And so, if the prisoner were charged with robbing A B, with an allegation that A B was at the time dressed in black, the latter allegation might be rejected as being not only immaterial to the charge, but also immaterial to the identity of A B. But if, on a charge of robbing A B, the proof were of a robbery committed on C D, the allegation of the name could not be rejected; for if it could, then the very object of requiring circumstantial certainty would be defeated; it would be nugatory to compel the description of the person robbed by his name, and if the name could not be rejected, the offence charged could not be the same with that proved.

It seems, however, that an allegation, descriptive of a material thing, ought not to be rejected, even although such description were not essential, or were even superadded to one already sufficient. For the grand jury may have deemed such further description to be essential with a view to the identity of the fact, and if it be so, then in the particular case the description is material in order to distinguish between two transactions, to which a more general description, and such as would, in ordinary cases, be sufficient, might apply.

If, for instance, A, having borrowed several horses from B, were charged with having stolen one of them, a white horse, the rest being black, then although the allegation that A stole a horse, the property of B, would be in itself sufficient, as containing a complete charge, yet in the particular case supposed this would leave it doubtful whether the jury meant to charge the stealing of the white horse or one of the black ones, it might, therefore, be doubtful whether the taking, of which evidence was offered on the trial, was the same with that on which the charge by the grand jury was founded. Upon a second indictment, couched also in general terms, doubts might arise whether such second indictment related to the same horse with that on which the first indictment was founded. Such doubts would be excluded by the more special allegation, on the first indictment, that A stole a white horse, the property of B; and under such an allegation to admit evidence of stealing a black horse would, if it appeared that there had been several transactions, one relating to a white, others to black horses, be to inquire into a case different from that charged by the grand jury; and although it did not appear that there were in fact two transactions to which the more general description was applicable, the fact would be properly presumable from the very circumstance of the grand jury having deemed it to be necessary to insert the more special description. To allow such a presumption to be removed by evidence would be inconvenient, as involving a collateral inquiry, the result of which would often be unsatisfactory without an examination of the grand jurors themselves, who might have founded the special description upon their own knowledge. The disregarding such a variance might also be attended with a strange incongruity on the face of a judicial record. A, being acquitted on a charge of stealing a white horse, on a second charge of stealing a black one, the property of the same person, might plead his acquittal on the former charge, averring that the white horse of the former indictment was the same with the black horse of the latter, and not only might it be alleged that a white horse and a black one were the same animal, the fact might be found by the record to be true.

As the object of circumstantial description is to give notice to the defendant and to identify the offence, the sufficiency of the indictment in this respect ought obviously to be provided for previously to the trial. And where a defendant has had the means afforded him, before the trial, of requiring further particulars as to the details of the charge, it is to be presumed that he had sufficient notice to enable him to prepare for his defence; and his having neglected to use those means can furnish no reasonable ground for holding the charge itself to be invalid, provided it exhibited such facts as, if true, are a warrant for the judgment. Where, in truth, the defendant had been misled or surprised in any material point, the proper mode of relief would seem to be by a new trial. After the trial it must also be presumed that the charge which was then entered into was the same with that inquired into by the grand jury; the circumstances proved on the trial afford ample means for identifying the charge, or distinguishing it from one subsequently made, in the case of a plea of the former acquittal or conviction. It has been assumed that the accused has had opportunity afforded him for objecting to the want of particularity, and that the Court had power to remedy the defect, so far as it was remediable, either by ordering the prosecutor to state such particulars as might be requisite, with a view to identify and notify the offence charged, so far as was practicable, or to quash the indictment altogether, either for not shewing such a complete and distinct charge as would determine and warrant the judgment in case of conviction, or for want of particulars which might have been stated, or the statement of them in too vague or uncertain a manner to answer the double purpose of identifying and notifying the matter charged.

In conclusion, as regards indictments, we think it desirable that forms of indictments should be inserted in a schedule to the Act. As we cannot, however, assume that the rules and principles which we have suggested as the proper foundation for the preparation of such forms will be approved of, the introduction of a set of precedents at present would, we conceive, be premature.

The 3rd chapter embraces the proceedings from the time of presenting a formal charge against the accused with a view to his trial, to that of his being brought or compelled to appear to make his answer to it. Formerly, as has been seen, such a charge was the original primary proceeding, and upon this writs were and still may be issued in order to compel the appearance of the accused; and this portion of criminal procedure was, and still is, technically denominated process. These writs consist of the venire facias ad respondendum, which is in the nature of a summons, and is issuable where the party is charged with a mere misdemeanor; the distringas, which operates against the property of the offender, and must be used where the charge is against a body corporate, or the inhabitants of a district; and if none of these is successful, the process is continued by writs of exigent with proclamations to outlawry, which operate as a complete judgment of conviction in all cases of treason or other felony. With respect to this branch of procedure, great changes have been wrought in more modern times. It now happens, in most cases, that by virtue of the preliminary proceedings, the subject of Chapter I., the supposed offender is at the time when the indictment is found either already in actual custody, or bound by his recognizance to appear and answer the charge. And even where this is not the case, and the party indicted is at large at the time when the indictment is found, and not already bound by recognizance to answer it, the process by writ is seldom resorted to, the practice having been superseded by the more modern one, supported and facilitated by many statutes of great convenience, of proceeding against the party, and arresting him on a bench warrant, or a judge's or magistrate's warrant. The proceeding, however, by the writ of venire is still necessary in some instances already alluded to, where it is against a body corporate, the inhabitants of a county, parish, or other district, or, in some instances, where it is intended to proceed to outlawry. As this is a process to which it may still be necessary to resort where a party charged with a crime by indictment or otherwise withdraws himself from justice, it is, of course, essential that the ancient forms should be adopted, or that others more convenient and efficacious should be substituted. We should transgress our powers in framing new provisions of this description, but we think it right to suggest that the object of the process of outlawry would be more easily and satisfactorily attained by substituting for the present laborious and expensive process, attended as it is with many useless niceties, which might almost seem to have been devised for subverting the outlawry when completed, a more summary and effectual method of notifying to the accused that he is required to surrender himself to answer the demands of justice. We think that after the unsuccessful issuing of one or two writs of capias, it should be sufficient, previously to the judgment of outlawry, to give such notice in the Gazette, or otherwise, as in the somewhat analogous case of proceeding in bankruptcy, in order to warrant the presumption that the party wilfully and contumaciously evaded inquiry.

THE PROPERTY LAWYER.

NOTES ON CONVEYANCING CASES.

LANDLORD AND TENANT—AGRICULTURAL LEASES.

THERE are, perhaps, no instruments affecting landed property which are framed with less consideration of the real contract between the parties than agricultural leases. They are often either copied from an old lease, many of the stipulations of which may have been suited to the condition of agriculture a century ago, but are entirely inconsistent with the more improved husbandry of the present day, or they omit altogether all provision for many events which, from the nature of the contract, must or may occur during the term, or at its determination. Both methods lead occasionally to consequences not foreseen or intended. Now, what is the contract which is intended to be entered into between the landlord and the tenant by an agricultural lease?

The owner of the land contracts that the tenant shall, in consideration of an annual rent, have the possession of the land for a definite term, for the purposes of cultivation, with a view to profit; the tenant contracts for such a possession of the land as will enable him, by the application of capital and judgment, to obtain the ordinary rate of remuneration for his industry and outlay. A farming tenant usually looks but little at the particular stipulations of the lease, which is always prepared by the landlord's advisers, and he seldom consults any professional person on his own behalf as to the legal effect and consequences of those stipulations. In this way a form of lease which has been in use upon the estate or in the district for a century may be adopted; and if the tenant should point out that some of its provisions are unsuited to present practices in husbandry, he is told that those particular stipulations are not intended to be enforced. Or should the tenant's objections to the obsolete stipulations of the old forms be insuperable, an agreement is probably made, omitting nearly all stipulation with respect to the management, or the entry upon, or the giving up the lands; consequently, much that is left unprovided for will be regulated by the custom of the country. In neither case is such a position safe for either of the parties. In the first case, the tenant habitually disregards the express stipulations of his obsolete lease, and is continually open to damages for breach of covenant, and perhaps to eviction for doing that which it was the real intention of both parties he should do. In the second case, the tenant is bound by that practically uncertain and ill-defined code called "the custom of the country," and which, when it has been defined, is commonly found to be in a great degree inconsistent with good husbandry, in the present state of that art.

Of the evil consequences of obsolete forms of agricultural leases, the very recent case of Sir James Graham v. Tweddle, set down for trial at the late Cumberland Assizes, and afterwards referred to arbitration, affords a forcible example. The outline of that case, which has been much commented upon by the public journals, was this: the tenant's father, nineteen years ago, had taken from the landlord's father some twenty acres of land near Longtown; it was accommodation land, not intended to be cultivated in precisely the same way as a larger farm, nevertheless the lease adopted was the common form in use upon the estate for farms in general, and it bound the tenant to the performance of several physical impossibilities, and not a few absurdities. For instance, the tenant was required to reside on the land, upon which there was not, nor had there ever been, the vestige of a house. Some of the farming stipulations, also, when examined, appeared to be utterly inconsistent with and directly contradictory to others; yet the tenant was bound to perform both classes of covenants. Some offence having been taken by the landlord at the political opinions of his tenant, an attempt was made by means of these obsolete covenants to punish the tenant, as was distinctly avowed by the plaintiff's counsel, for his political independence. The attempt did not succeed, a verdict for the tenant having been awarded; but that was the result of the peculiar circumstances of the case, for, under such an agreement, the tenant of a regular farm would unquestionably have been made liable to damages of some amount.

And, perhaps, few of our professional readers are completely aware of the extent to which the value of landed property is depreciated by these restrictive and obsolete stipulations. At the present day there are numerous persons of capital, intelligence, and enterprise, who are prepared to embark in the business of farming, with much of that energetic purpose which has characterized the mercantile and manufacturing undertakings of this country, but they are estopped at the commencement by the covenants they are required to enter into for the regulation of their cultivation. These are the tenants who will not only give the best rents, and pay them most punctually, but their example will have the effect of improving the systems of husbandry practised by those who have been termed the "jog-trot" farmers of the country; and this latter class is at present in an immense majority.

It is impossible to avoid, seeing that a great change is now coming over the management of the landed property of the country. Gentlemen and their agents have been for some years past urging their tenants to adopt improved systems of husbandry, and to conduct their business upon a more enterprising scale than has hitherto been common; and the most intelligent of the tenantry in all parts of England have responded to such exhortations, that it is the want of leases, or the obsolete or unreasonable stipulations of the leases and agreements in almost universal use, by which all the tenants' efforts to improve are cramped and impeded. We know that in this complaint there is much truth. The first step a landowner or his agent, desirous of improving his property, and of keeping up or increasing his rental—and we are convinced the rentals of most of the great properties of the country might be increased by a different system of management, not only without injury, but with positive advantage to the tenantry — ought to adopt is, to frame a simple and rational form of lease, adapted to the peculiarities of his district, and calculated to attract men of skill and capital to undertake the cultivation of his farms. And to this object we would draw the attention of our professional friends, especially country practitioners, as the means by which some of that respectable branch of the country solicitor's business, land agency, may be recovered to the profession. The rigid adherence to antiquated forms on the part of lawyer agents, and the events of the last thirty years which have rendered farming a fluctuating and uncertain business, have been the chief causes for the transfer of so many land agencies into the hands of surveyors and valuers. The time is now come when the profession, especially the country practitioners, if equal to the emergency—and who can doubt that they are equal to it?—must again recover the management of landed properties. Surveyors and valuers are useful agents enough when each half-year brings demands for abatement of rent, or an opportunity for withholding abatements previously made; but that system is now virtually at an end. All intelligent landlords and tenants are agreed on this point, that permanent arrangements for considerable periods of time are necessary for the mutual benefit of both parties, and the great problem of the day is, by how little restriction on the tenant can the fair rights of the landlord be secured? An extensive and long-continued course of observation has satisfied us that a few simple and effective provisions, which would not impede the operations of the tenant, would amply secure the landlord. It must never be forgotten that all unnecessary restriction on the tenant is the loss of so much of rent to the landlord. If our readers deem this question worthy of attention, we may possibly again advert to it. R. G. W.

LEGAL INTELLIGENCE.

The New Judge of the Westminster Court of Requests.—Notwithstanding the election of Mr. D. C. Moylan to the office of Judge of the Court of Requests, in Castle-street, Leicester-square, the several parishes in Westminster on Saturday proceeded to the election of Commissioners of the Court for the ensuing year, under the Parochial Act. This has led to some remark in Westminster, as it was generally supposed the judge was appointed in the place of those gentlemen, and the question is asked, what part are they to take in the decisions of the Court? If simply as a jury under the directions of the judge, it is expected that many will not serve, as the qualification required is a high one, and confines the selection to the higher classes of tradesmen. And, again, it is said if the commissioners are to decide irrespective of the judge, his office will be a useless one. It seems that the learned gentleman cannot take his seat until approved of by her Majesty at the next Privy Council. The salary is estimated at about 1,200*l.* a year, and it is expected that under this new arrangement a more commodious court will be erected in the place of the present inconvenient office.—Globe.

Capital Punishment.—Edinburgh, Aug. 26.—The discussion on Councillor Russell's motion in favour of the total repeal of the laws which inflict capital punishments was resumed this day in our town-council, and carried by a majority of 12 to 5.

French Criminal Jurisprudence.—"We have repeatedly," observes the National, "expressed our disapprobation of the manner of summing up adopted by the Presidents of Assize. The resume, as the word itself indicates, ought simply to be a recapitulation of the principal arguments pro and con. and nothing more nor less. Unfortunately at the present day many of the Presidents of Assize no longer confine themselves to the limits prescribed by the law, and of this fact the Droit of the 30th of August furnishes us with a melancholy example: it says, 'An individual yesterday appeared before the Court of Assize at Versailles, accused of a capital offence. The President concluded his summing up with the following words.—You will bear in mind, gentlemen, how the bringing in extenuating circumstances has been the object of criticism of the press and public in general.' Is not a remark of this nature in the summing up of a judge contrary to what the law authorizes, and is it not of a nature to leave upon the minds of the gentlemen of the jury a strong and lasting impression? The result was that the jury did not in that instance bring in extenuating circumstances, and the accused was consequently condemned to death. We do not wish to be understood to find fault with the verdict of the jury, but simply with the manner of summing up adopted by the judge, which we conceive to be diverging from the path prescribed by law. This is what we would wish to demonstrate."

CORRESPONDENCE.

REAL PROPERTY STATUTES.—SHORT CONVEYANCES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

Sir,—Your rational and temperate views on the probable working of the new Act, introducing authorized brief forms in conveyancing will, I believe, be approved by a great majority of the Profession.

In short, notwithstanding the exaggerations and high colouring of Lord Campbell's and Lord Brougham's accounts of modern conveyancing, which produced such dramatic effect in the house, it is a notorious fact that, during the last ten or twelve years, particularly amongst the younger members of the Profession, great efforts have been made (principally with a view to benefit the poorer class of clients) to cultivate brevity and perspicuity in conveyancing, and, in many attorneys' offices, before the Act passed for abolishing the lease for a year, it had already been voluntarily dispensed with, and the expense both of preparation and stamp thereof saved to the client, by the constant adoption of appointments to uses—a course, with many others of like intention, suggested several years back by a respected member of the bar, and regular contributor to the Law Magazine (a).

The statement made by one of those noble lords, that the cost of a conveyance frequently equalled that of the freehold itself," was too disgracefully false to have been passed over in silence, had there been any [illegible] the House of Peers at all acquainted with practical conveyancing at the present day. Claiming some little experience in that department, after twelve years' practice, I venture to assert, in contradiction to the noble lords, that in small purchases the cost of the conveyance seldom exceeds ten per cent. on the purchase-money, and even of that nearly one-half goes to government for stamps—and may add that for many years I have used a form of mortgage, with power of sale, and covenant to insure all, included in a single skin; and, to my knowledge, a similar form is widely adopted in offices in the north of England. This course, in future, will be rendered nugatory, I fancy, by the terms of the new Act. Their lordships would have been wiser had they somewhat curtailed the flowers of speech when exaggerating the length of modern conveyances, and exerted themselves to relieve the poor client from that absurd injustice of having to pay stamp duty on a nonentity; viz. the abolished lease for a year.

In answer to one of the queries of your correspondent, H. B. I should humbly submit that there is no danger of short deeds under the new Act being chargeable to stamp duty in respect of the long forms in Column 2. Such words will not be referred to by the deed, and a stamp can hardly be required upon a mere case of abstract construction or operation laid down by a statute.

In reply to another of the queries, I should suppose that the new form [illegible] added as the practitioner may find requisite to suit the circumstances of the title (see section 5), and therefore that in the covenant for quiet enjoyment, encumbrances, &c. by ancestors and others may be provided for by the addition of the few words necessary for the purpose.

I am glad to see your suggestions as to the adoption of some new criterion of charges for conveyancing. In spite of vulgar sneers, I will give it as my sincere opinion that attorneys are often inadequately remunerated in this branch of the Profession, especially considering the responsibility they frequently take upon themselves in investigating titles, rather than put their clients to expense of having abstracts perused and drafts settled by counsel. It will be a difficult matter to adopt some fair and adequate basis of charge, and would be a good subject for discussion at the different Law Institutions. A per-centage is not a bad idea but how would the rich like it? I am, Sir, yours, &c.

Halifax. M. H. Rankin.

NON-PROFESSIONAL ADVOCATES AT PETTY SESSIONS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

Sir,—I am glad to observe, by an article in your last paper, that the above-mentioned subject is beginning to attract the attention of the magistracy and the profession; and as the irregularities complained of are very general, I would strongly impress upon all Law Societies the necessity of applying to the magistrates acting in the localities of such societies, to make orders for excluding all persons, except regularly admitted and certificated attorneys or solicitors, from acting as advocates in cases at Petty Sessions. Some objections are made to the exclusion of experienced clerks, on account of the inconvenience which their principals may sustain by being obliged to attend personally in every trifling case which they may happen to be consulted about; but if such an objection were allowed, it would be impossible to draw a line of distinction, for every non-professional advocate commences his case by saying, "I appear for the defendant on behalf of Mr. X., the attorney, who is unable to attend," &c. It must also be evident that mere inconvenience should not be allowed to prevail when it is compared with the loss of respect in the minds of the public which the members of the profession, as a body, must sustain by the conduct and demeanour of that class of persons who are generally found putting themselves forward at Police Courts and Petty Sessions as "apres stuluies" of attorneys.

The subject was discussed at the last meeting of our Denbighshire and Flintshire Law Association, and the members resolved to use their individual exertions to put an end to the system. The magistrates in this division have, upon the application of some of the attorneys here, made the following order:—"That no one but a regularly admitted and certificated attorney or solicitor be in future allowed to appear and act as an advocate before the magistrates in Special or Petty Sessions for this division; and that notice of this order be given to all the attorneys and [illegible] practising in this division."

I trust that the profession generally will follow the matter up, and that similar orders may be obtained at every Petty Sessions in the kingdom.

I remain, Sir, yours, &c.

Clerk to the Magistrates.

THE SMALL DEBTS ACT AND THE COUNTY COURT.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

Sir,—I have noticed that the typography of the Law Times is usually remarkably correct, but in the third paragraph of my letter on the above subject in your last, there is an error, which makes the sense the contrary of what I intended to convey. The paragraph in question (instead of as printed) should read thus:—"Sections 1 and 4, by force of general phraseology, seem to have brought within their operation the County Court. Of course no notice is taken of the peculiarity of the procedure therein, and no provisions applicable thereto vouchsafed; and, although about the most ancient court in the kingdom, it is not even mentioned by name."

I take this opportunity to observe further on the Act, that (as I think) an injudicious obstacle to its working is thrown in the way by requiring the summons to a debtor to be granted, and the matter of it heard, by the Commissioner or Court, "within the jurisdiction of which such debtor shall reside or be." Supposing a creditor to obtain a judgment in the County Court of Essex against a party who afterwards goes to reside in London, the creditor must apply to a commissioner there, who informs him that "he has no authority under the statute unless the judgment has been obtained in a court of 'competent' jurisdiction; that he (the commissioner) is personally responsible for his acts, and as he knows nothing of the County Court of Essex, or, at any rate, whether the circumstances of the case were such at the time the action was brought that that Court had jurisdiction, he cannot assist applicant, for whom he is very sorry."

I think, therefore, that the creditor should have the power to summon the debtor (reside where he may) in the local court wherein judgment was had. And, since warrants may be executed and executions levied out of the jurisdiction of such Court (sec. 12), I can [illegible] no reason why the summons to debtors should not be so served, and also the summons to witnesses (sec. 18). Cæteris paribus, if any inconvenience is to be suffered or expense incurred, the debtor, and not the creditor, should be the subject of it; but according to the provisions of this Act, it is the contrary.

The practical result of requiring a creditor to summon the debtor in the district where such debtor resides, and of declaring that in making any application under the Act it shall not be requisite to employ either counsel or attorney, sec. 6 (the operation of which last-mentioned clause I suppose to be—if enacting that a thing shall be law which was equally law before, can be held to have any effect—that if the creditor employs counsel or attorney, the costs must come out of his own pocket), is, that in all cases of judgments under the circumstances instanced the Act is a nullity, or—similar to that will-o'-the-wisp-like emanation of the same legal genius, the "Act to Simplify the Transfer of Real Property,"—a mockery, a delusion, and a snare.

Reason has established in all men's minds the soundness of the principle of the Act under consideration, but the plan on which it has been attempted to carry out that principle seems to have been literally one of perversity—protecting the debtor at the expense of the creditor,—"suppressing the legal adviser for the sake of the client,"—ordering a man to be committed and no officer to carry him to gaol; (a) but if any man be found bold enough to seize and carry the debtor there, remunerating him at a rate insufficient to satisfy his reasonable expenses, (b) to say nothing of his time and the responsibility—promoting morality in prisons by a swearing-made-easy clause (s. 7), &c. &c., a perversity which altogether can only be likened to the first rule of the grammar of the Somersetshire dialect, determining that "every thing be called he, except a tom-cat, which is to be called she."

An English writer once said of a certain person's public career, that he went up like a rocket, and came down like a stick. And of you, O Vaux! what shall be said? Considering the "eccentric flights," the "balloon-like ascents" of your imagination, 7,000 feet at least above the level of your own or the understanding of any one else; your "Protean transformations," and remarkable facility in performing, almost simultaneously, two entirely different characters, and generally the extreme versatility of your in-

SHAM LAWYERS.

Honiton, Devon, Sept. 25, 1845.

SIR,—I herewith send you copy of a letter received by a client of mine from a Mr. Wm. Hy. Isaac. I give you the copy verbatim et literatim. I have nothing extenuated, nor set down aught in malice. My client took no notice of Mr. Isaac's application, and he has since been served with a copy of a writ of summons to appear in the Common Pleas, which is tested the 1st September, and is endorsed us having been issued by John Barber, of No. 11, Furnival's Inn, in the county of Middlesex, as attorney for John Hooper, who, however, declares he knows nothing of Mr. Barber, nor ever employed him. I need scarcely add, that Mr. Isaac is not an attorney. He has long been resident in this town, and has had much employment in former times from the attorneys here in serving writs, notices, &c. and levying distresses; of late, I believe, he has found more profitable employment from acting on his own account. Who the Mr John Barber, of No. 11, Furnival's Inn, who co-operates with Mr. Isaac, may be, I cannot say, but perhaps you or some of your readers can supply the necessary information.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

R. H. ABERDEIN.

SELECTIONS FROM CORRESPONDENCE.

"SPECTATOR" thus comments on a subject which has been often discussed in these columns:—

Some of your correspondents appear to have imbibed a taste for distinctions in dress, which might have been expected from the disciples of my namesake, a century and a half ago. I am by no means confident in the opinion which I hold, but I am disposed to think that our rank in society is sufficiently secured to us by the Legislature of days which all classes unite now in respecting, and that nothing can become "us" more than the dress of an English gentleman simply. If any of your readers really have felt inconvenience, when attending the courts, from a want of distinction from the "vulgar crowd," I may, perhaps, be permitted to suggest to them the unostentatious use, in their button-hole or hat-ribbon, of a few inches of red tape. From experience I am enabled to say that, with the assistance of it and a smiling countenance, the "crowd" will separate for "us," and the "surly porter" will unbend his brow.

PHILOS submits the following question:—

Permit me to inquire, through your journal, what rule prevails in the Profession as to the fees of the Clerical Commissioner taking the oaths of executors and administrators in the country? In some cases, a guinea is taken, in others, but half a guinea. It seems that some uniform scale should be adopted; and if it were the practice throughout the kingdom to give half a guinea where the effects are under 1,000*l*. and a guinea in other cases, it would, I believe, give general satisfaction. But disseminated knowledge alone can produce uniformity.

"G. M. S." thus notes an error in Mr. CAREY'S Lectures:—

In referring to the case from Campbell, in Carey's Law of Contracts (No. 129, p. 526) you state that the nature of the transaction was endeavoured to be concealed by a fictitious sale of ostrich feathers to the borrower, for a sum of money returned some time in the same day, so that the party paid in money 5 per cent. upon 90*l*. instead of 100*l*. I think in this there must be some mistake; for if the party paid 5 per cent. upon 90*l*. he but paid legal interest.

Do you not mean, that the party paid five pounds, instead of five per cent? This would make the usury apparent.

CONVEYANCING.

THERE is a provision in the Act of the last Session for abbreviating certain common forms in conveyances, to which we omitted to refer in the brief notice that had been suggested by the complaints of many correspondents. As this provision is a partial accomplishment of the proposition we had previously suggested for the payment of conveyancing by some other scale than mere length, we are induced again to direct to it the special attention of the Profession.

It is provided by the fourth section of this Act:—

That in taxing any bill for preparing or executing any deed under this Act, it shall be lawful for the taxing officer, and he is hereby required, in estimating the proper sum to be charged for such transaction, to consider, not the length of such deed, but only the skill and labour employed, and responsibility incurred in the preparation thereof.

Our proposition was that, as a general rule, (subject of course to exceptions under special circumstances), the charges for conveyancing should be regulated by the value of the property conveyed. The advantages of such an arrangement would be found in the ease and rapidity with which the charge would be calculated, in uniformity of charge among practitioners, and the satisfaction which its apparent justice would afford to the client. We are of course alive to the ready objection that the labour and skill required are not in fact proportionate with the value of the property; that as long a deed (and often a much longer one) is needed for this conveyance of an estate of 500*l*. as for one of 5,000*l*. But we contend that, practically, the conveyancer is now compelled rudely to regulate his charges more by value than by length, and that for the most part the labour does increase with the value. The question, like almost all other questions that arise in the business of life, is not whether a perfect system could be framed, but which of the plans proposed presents the greater number of advantages and the fewest evils. The old system of charges by length alone has been formally abolished by an Act of the legislature; henceforth it will be impracticable, and the serious matter for the consideration of the Profession now is, what shall be the rule to regulate for the future the charges for conveyancing. It is to this that we ask the instant and serious attention of its members.

When first we considered the subject, we were inclined to jump at the conclusion that the Act itself had supplied a solution of the difficulty; but further reflection shewed that it was not so. The Act provides that the taxed costs for conveyancing shall be regulated, not by the length, but by "the skill and labour employed and responsibility incurred." In cases of taxation, reference being had to a competent judge to determine, under all the circumstances of the case, the result will be attained without much difficulty. But how in the numberless transactions that never come before the taxing-master? By what scale are the skill, labour, and responsibility to be measured? Is it to be left to the individual judgment of each practitioner to set his own value on his own work? Certainly this will be no easy matter for him, and it is a difficulty which is very likely indeed to lead to differences with his client.

Besides, there is another objection to this plan of leaving the charge wholly to the mere self-estimate of the conveyancer. In an inquiry intended to be practical, it would be folly to affect a confidence in a virtue and a wisdom which does not belong to ordinary human nature. Solicitors, in common with other men, are not likely to be the best judges in a matter affecting their own interests; they, equally with their fellows, may be apt to set very different values upon their own labours, and take different views of their skill and responsibility. It is because of this natural bias of the judgment that experience, in all ages and countries, has established scales of fees by which professional services are to be rewarded. Thus only could uniformity be assured, and none will question the advantage, nay, the necessity, of as near an approach as possible to uniformity of charge in the Legal Profession.

Now this is the point to which we desire to draw the urgent attention of the Profession. The old scale of charges by length is virtually abolished by the new Act, which substitutes payment proportioned to skill, labour, and responsibility. But although these are ingredients which may be readily determined by the taxing-master, they do not supply a satisfactory standard for charges in bills untaxed, because of the very different values which would be set upon those ingredients by different persons, and the consequent difficulty which the practitioner will find in making out his charges, the dissatisfaction he is likely to give to his client, and the entire absence of that uniformity of charge throughout the Profession which is so essential to its harmony and respectability. The statute has not supplied a proper substitute for the scale abolished; but that which the statute has not done, the Profession, by a self-made regulation, should attempt to do. The law societies should consider well what scale of charges they should recommend to the adoption of the Profession. We are sure that any such recommendation would be received with respect, and find ready acquiescence with all the members of the Profession whose assent would be desirable. As we have already stated, the plan which appears to us to offer the greatest conveniences with the least disadvantages, is that of a scale of fees regulated by the value of the property conveyed; or, perhaps, as a nearer approach to equity, by the amount of the stamps, which would indicate length as well as value. In this we include, as does the Act, the conveyance only; all the charges for investigating title, &c. will of course remain as now. We throw out the suggestion with much deference, and merely in aid of the general fund of opinion upon a subject of grave and urgent importance, and which must speedily force itself in a practical form upon the attention of every solicitor who is called upon to make out a bill for conveyancing.

THE SMALL DEBTS ACT.

This measure is working precisely as we had anticipated; nothing can be more perfect and satisfactory than its principle, nothing more incomplete than its machinery. The great purpose of the plan, that of subjecting insolvent debtors to the rigorous examination of their creditors, and their summary punishment in case of fraud in the contraction, or evasion of the payment of their debts—is so effectively accomplished, that in the large majority of cases brought before the Courts the end has been at once attained; the debtor has submitted to the order of the Court, regulated by his means, and payment has been made accordingly. In very few instances indeed has it been found necessary to enforce the punishment prescribed by the Act, and never has it been awarded save when there was manifest proof of roguery on the part of the defendant.

We need not say, after the interest we have taken in this measure, how cordially we congratulate our readers and our countrymen generally on this result. How changed is now the position of creditors from that which it was at this period of last year. Just then the law had virtually deprived them of all remedy for the recovery of debts under 20*l.* Our table was daily loaded with letters from all parts of the country, detailing cases of grievous injury resulting from the sudden withdrawal of the protection of the law from unlucky creditors. Among the multitudes of dishonest debtors there was a great rejoicing. The law had given them an indemnity; they were free from fears of punishment for defrauding their creditors, and they were not slow to avail themselves of the liberty thus allowed to them. While the rogue was rejoicing, the honest man was threatened with ruin: when he demanded payment of his debts, he was received with a laugh; all debts under 20*l.* were virtually confiscated.

How different the picture now. Thanks to the Small Debts Act, a debt under 20*l.* is now more easily and sooner recoverable than a larger debt. Instead of laughing at his creditor and telling him to get his money if he can, the debtor hastens to pay or compromise, because he dreads the examination into his doings and affairs to which this law subjects him, even more than he fears the punishment it awards. He is assured that evasion is no longer possible, unless he is prepared to submit to continual imprisonments. If he have property anywhere, or can by any labour procure it, pay he must, or shew good reason why he cannot. Brief has been the saturnalia of the rogues; their short respite has been succeeded by a punishment quite as severe and vastly more certain.

Still, as was observed, would defects have been already developed in the machinery of this excellent measure. The defects which were frequently and ably pointed out by so many of our correspondents, while it was passing through the Legislature and when they might have been easily supplied, are now provokingly apparent, and will demand the further labours of the Parliament in the next session. It was from no negligence on our part that these objections were disregarded. Besides publishing them in the columns of the Law Times, where they were sure to be seen by the lawyers in both Houses, we took the pains to collect them in a formal memorial, which we submitted to the quarter most concerned in the management of the Bill; but the lateness of the session, and a fear lest any delay might prevent the measure from passing, were pleaded as the reason for throwing it into the world with all its imperfections on its head. We have scarcely seen one difficulty which has arisen in practice which was not anticipated in these columns and might have been avoided,—another proof of the danger of hasty legislation.

A defect has just occurred to us which should be noted as one of the faults to be corrected when opportunity offers. It is this:—

As some of the judges have construed the Act (though, we think, wrongly), the presence of the plaintiff in person is required. What a hardship will this work! Suppose a creditor in London summoning a debtor in Yorkshire. He must, according to this rule, incur the cost of a journey to Yorkshire before he can procure justice. We trust this decision will be reconsidered. It will strip the Act of half its worth. Besides, it is contrary to the general practice of our law, which permits all but persons criminally charged to appear by attorney.

We shall continue to watch the proceedings under this useful measure, and give to our readers the earliest and best information of all decisions by competent authorities. Let us add that we shall feel greatly obliged if attorneys practising in any of the Commissioners' Courts in the country, where we have not already regular reporters, will send us accurate reports of any important points that may arise, authenticating them with their names, for our private satisfaction that they are to be relied upon.

It will be seen, by the advertisements in this day's Law Times, that in various parts of the country advantage will be taken of the provisions of the statute to enlarge the jurisdiction of the local courts, for which purpose attorneys of ten years' standing or barristers must be appointed as judges. Many such elections are already in progress.

VERULAM SOCIETY.

Much confusion having arisen from complication of accounts and transfer of payments and of subscriptions from one account to another, it has been arranged for the future that, instead of subscription, a bill will be sent half-yearly to the members for all publications of the Society had by them, such account to be paid within a month after delivery, otherwise the reduction of price to members not to be allowed. It is hoped that thus will be avoided the complaints now made. Under this arrangement, nothing more will be required than payment of the entrance-fee. The member will then be entitled to any of the publications of the Society at the reduced prices, on condition only of payment for such as he purchases within one month after delivery of the half-yearly account.

In a few days will be ready for delivery the common forms prescribed by the Conveyancing Acts of last session.

As [a] few more decisions will permit them to be drawn with safety, we propose to supply a series of forms required under the Small Debt Act.

Let us again repeat, that we have made an arrangement with Messrs. Knight and Co. by which the members of the Verulam Society can be supplied with any of their extensive series of Magistrates' and Parochial Forms at the reduced prices of the Society. A complete list of these is in preparation, and will be soon ready for delivery.

Again, let us say, that suggestions of Practical Forms will oblige.

As soon as the lawyers return to town, an endeavour will be made to bring out some practical text-books; the difficulty lies in procuring competent writers. We propose a continuation of Chitty's Practical Statutes, and a Dictionary of Mercantile Law. The latter was suggested by an admirable work of the same kind we saw in Belgium; and we are informed that the practitioners in France have found the form of a dictionary so useful for books of practice, that they prefer it to any other.

Lecture XV.

Zinc—Salts—Chemical analysis—White vitriol—Tests. Antimony—Chemical analysis—Tests.

Another metal which possesses, in certain forms, poisonous properties, is tin. There are two poisonous salts of tin, the chloride and the muriate, which are employed under the name of Dyer's spirit. This compound is used for the purpose of dyeing, and gives rise to many serious, though seldom fatal, accidents. The symptoms produced by this substance are like those produced by all the other irritant poisons, and where it has been administered the best antidote that can be employed is milk. With regard to the chemical analysis of this poison, the oxide of tin is very easily detected by hydrosulphuret of ammonia, which gives, in a solution of the salt of tin, a yellowish precipitate of sulphuret of tin. Now, cadmium, tin, and arsenic give a yellow precipitate with sulphuretted hydrogen gas, and therefore it becomes necessary to distinguish between them. The sulphuret of tin is distinguishable from an arsenical liquid by its being insoluble in ammonia, while the sulphuret of arsenic is soluble; and it differs from cadmium in this, that it is quite insoluble in muriatic acid. Cadmium is quite soluble in muriatic acid, because chloride of cadmium is formed by it. This is very important to know. The protochloride of tin is easily detected by being precipitated brown by hydrosulphuret of ammonia or sulphuretted hydrogen. But many poisons give a brown precipitate with hydrosulphuret of ammonia, and this offers an objection to any inference from the colour. How, then, do we know it to be protochloride of tin? The experiment for determining this question is very simple. If we add to a solution of the protochloride of tin a drop or two of chloride of gold, a deep purple brown, and almost black, precipitate is formed.

Another metal which may be ranked with the irritant poisons, though in a medico-legal point of view it is not very important, is zinc. You may be asked, What are the poisonous salts of zinc? The salts of zinc are the sulphate, the carbonate, and the oxide of zinc. The sulphate of zinc (white vitriol) is well known in commerce. It is seen in enormous white crystals, closely resembling sulphate of magnesia, or Epsom salts. It is a powerful emetic in doses of from one to two scruples; from this circumstance, therefore, it demands attention, since it is often present in the stomach when a person has taken poison. It possesses a very strong metallic taste, and can scarcely be taken by a rational person, ignorantly, in any quantity sufficient to destroy life. The best antidotes are those substances containing caseum, such as split-peas, and milk, and infusions containing tannin: pea-soup is often exhibited. There is, however, but little fear of an adult person dying from the effects of zinc; and its effects are most apparent in young children. In the analysis of zinc, one point is to distinguish the crystals from those of oxalic acid. Now oxalic acid is known to be quite volatile, while the sulphate of zinc is fixed. Sulphate of zinc is also very readily dissolved in water, taking up about one-third of its weight at common temperatures. The tests for zinc are three in number; first, sesqui-carbonate of ammonia, which gives a white precipitate. This test is not a very delicate one, and in fact we are rather in want of a satisfactory delicate test for this metal. The sesqui-carbonate of ammonia precipitates many other substances white; such as magnesia, lead, cadmium, tin, barytes, strontia, and others; but there is no other substance which is thrown down by the sesqui-carbonate of ammonia, and which is redissolved by it when added in excess, but zinc. Secondly, ferrocyanate of potash, which gives a white precipitate of ferrocyanate of zinc.

A great many bodies are thrown down by this substance also, and so far it is no criterion: lead and silver are thus precipitated by it. Common alum is likely to be mistaken for sulphate of zinc, and ferrocyanate of potash is a good means of distinguishing it from sulphate of zinc, for alum is not precipitated by it. Thirdly, hydrosulpheret of ammonia or sulphurretted hydrogen. This gives a white precipitate with a solution of zinc, and zinc is the only metal which is precipitated white by sulphuretted hydrogen. If the solution be much acidulated, sulphuretted hydrogen gas produces no effect whatever; and here we come to the practical means of separating arsenic from zinc in a person's stomach. If the sulphate of zinc be dissolved, we may pass in a current of sulphuretted hydrogen, and its presence is immediately indicated by a milky-white froth. The sulphuret of zinc may then be decomposed by muriatic acid. The white sulphuret of zinc is apt to conceal faint traces of arsenic, where it has been given as an emetic in cases of arsenical poisoning. The sulphuret of arsenic is soluble in ammonia, and may be separated from the sulphuret of zinc. By very strongly acidulating the mixed liquid with muriatic acid before passing into it a current of sulphuretted hydrogen, arsenic alone will be precipitated, but the zinc will remain suspended. Again, in a solution of sesqui-carbonate of ammonia containing carbonate of zinc dissolved, the zinc is precipitated by hydrosulphuret of ammonia or sulphuretted hydrogen. The only other point to be noticed in connection with sulphate of zinc relates to the means to be adopted for discovering the acid of the salt. This is done by means of nitrate of barytes. The tests for zinc may not be satisfactory where the white vitriol of commerce has been used, because it often contains iron. A preliminary test, therefore, to be employed in the case is ferrocyanate of potash, and if iron be present, the precipitate will be of a bluish-white colour. Allowance must therefore be made for the presence of this impurity.

The insoluble compounds of zinc are easily known. The oxide is soluble in acids, and when heated it becomes yellow. It is known in that way from magnesia, barytes, lime, and many other white powders. The chloride of zinc is very soluble, and it is easily detected by nitrate of silver. The acetate of zinc, which may be mistaken for the sulphate, is detected by boiling it in diluted sulphuric acid, when the acetic acid is separated, and is easily distinguished by its odour.

The next substance to be considered is antimony. This metal has produced serious effects in the form of the two compounds, tartar emetic, and the chloride, or butter of antimony. Although death is very rarely caused by it, it has produced alarming effects in doses of from half an ounce to an ounce. It occasions violent vomiting, and in that case there is a chance of its being expelled from the stomach. A case is related by Orfila, in which forty grains of tartar emetic killed an adult in four days.

The tests for antimony are very simple. Tartarised antimony is soluble in about fifteen parts of cold water and three of boiling water. If a small quantity of the solution be evaporated on a plate of glass, you will obtain most beautiful crystals, which we know from all others by their being tetrahedral. If you drop the powdered tartar emetic into hydrosulphuret of ammonia, you will see that there is a reddish-brown colour brought out, and by this it is known from other metallic salts, which all turn black. When the powder is washed, it becomes as red as brick-dust. When heated in a reduction-tube, it becomes charred, but it does not melt before charring, like acetate of lead. The antimony is partially reduced by the carbon of the vegetable acid, and the decomposed mass has a greyish-blue lustre. Many years ago, on a trial for arsenical poisoning, a witness was asked by one of the counsel whether tartarised antimony, when heated in a tube, would give a metallic sublimate; and he said he was not aware that it would. You will observe, therefore, that antimony gives no sublimate, but it is reduced and presents a greyish-blue colour. Supposing we have antimony in solution, there are two tests which we may use for its detection. This solution is remarkable for being precipitated by nitric acid, the sublimate of antimony being thereby formed. This is soluble in an excess of nitric acid; and another remarkable property which it possesses is, that it is perfectly soluble in tartaric acid. It possesses another character, that it is one of the few metallic solutions not precipitated by ferrocyanate of potash. That is an exception to the general rule. Sulphuretted hydrogen produces in the solution a reddish orange-coloured precipitate; and in this respect it has been supposed that even a practical chemist is likely to mistake it for arsenic. But there is a distinction in the colour; arsenic is of a bright golden colour, while the colour of antimony is that of a brick red. The hydrosulphuret of ammonia gives a reddish-brown tint, and the sulphuretted hydrogen a rich orange. The sesqui-sulphuret of antimony is entirely soluble in potash, and in this respect it differs from the sulphuret of cadmium, but resembles that of arsenic. It is partially soluble in ammonia, but the ammonia must be very strong, and the quantity precipitated very little, in order that it may be re-dissolved. The sulphuret of arsenic is quite soluble in ammonia, but sulphuret of antimony is not. When boiled in strong muriatic acid, it is soluble; in which respect it differs from the sesqui-sulphuret of arsenic. When collected and dried, it is decomposed; by boiling muriatic acid, sulphuretted hydrogen is evolved, and a solution of chloride of antimony is thus formed; and in this way the sulphuret of antimony is separated from that of the arsenic.

With respect to the detection of antimony in organic liquids, tartar emetic is precipitated by tannin in all its forms; it is decomposed by many organic substances; by albumen, caseum, and all kinds of food, and by the mucous membrane of the stomach. The suspected liquid must therefore be filtered, and the sulphuretted hydrogen test applied. Having ascertained the presence of antimony by passing into the liquid sulphuretted hydrogen, the sulphuret may be collected, and it will be found to have the usual orange-red or brown colour, and to be soluble in muriatic acid and forming a chloride. This will be decomposed by water; and antimony and bismuth are the only metals that are decomposed by water. How, then, do we distinguish antimony from bismuth? The most important difference between these two substances is that the precipitated sub-chloride of antimony is soluble in tartaric acid, while that of bismuth is not soluble in tartaric acid. There is a further difference, that with hydrosulphuret of ammonia antimony is precipitated red, but bismuth is precipitated black. Iron may be detected in the solution of antimony by the ferrocyanate of potash, which gives a blue precipitate with a salt of iron, and a white precipitate when the salt of antimony is not mixed with iron.

We were able only to give a short notice of this excellent publication, unaccompanied by extract, but we promised a specimen of its rich variety of contents when the leisure of the Long Vacation should permit. We now avail ourselves of the opportunity.

We take an interesting

MEMOIR OF LORD PRESIDENT BLAIR.

Few members of the legal profession in either country have left behind them a higher or a purer fame than the distinguished personage f whom we are now to speak. To talents of an exalted order as a lawyer and a judge, he added the gift of a masculine understanding, powerful over whatever subject its strength might be exercised; and though deficient in the portion of an advocate's qualifications which connects itself with the mere acting graces of manner, and even the more ordinary and easily acquired gifts of eloquence, he yet shewed his great powers even as an advocate, surpassed though these were by the extent of his learning and the weight of his opinion. His success, too, was commensurate with these endowments and acquirements; his station might always have been far higher had he chosen to sacrifice his ease, or been actuated by a more vulgar and bustling ambition; and he nevertheless closed his life in the first legal station on the Bench, after having for several years been placed by the unanimous choice of his brethren at the head of the Bar. To record the history of such a man is performing the duty of a work like ours.

Robert Blair was the third son of the Rev. R. Blair, well known as the author of a very popular poem, The Grave, a clergyman of learning as well as genius, and son of David Blair, King William's chaplain at the Hague, while yet stadtholder only, afterwards one of the ministers of Edinburgh, grandson of Robert Blair, chaplain of Charles I. a distinguished leader of the Covenanters, in which capacity the ghostly warrior bore the standard of the Scottish host at the famous battle of Marston Moor, where he joined his brethren in employing "the king's authority against his person." This remarkable individual had been some time settled at Bangor in Ireland, where he was the founder of the Ulster Synod. In Baillie's letters frequent mention is made of him, and from his high attainments, polite accomplishments, and dignified deportment, he was deemed a fit person to superintend the education of the royal children, in case the extremity of the struggle had been delayed, or it had ended in a compromise. It is not improper to note these particulars, because they enable us to trace through a succession of forefathers, not every capacity, but the peculiar species of capacity by which the subject of this memoir was distinguished; for it is easy to perceive the lineaments of the same masculine and lofty character both in the chaplain of William, evidently settled in Holland in order to escape the compliances required by the Charleses and the Jameses; and in the covenanting chief, who could both fill the pulpit and wield the sword in defence of his cherished principles.

The poet was settled at Athelstonford, in East Lothian, by a singular coincidence the same cure which was afterwards held by John Home, author of Douglas. He married Isabella Law, of Elvanston, one of the celebrated family of Law of Lawriston. The great lawyer had thus an hereditary title to the decision of character and firmness of purpose which ever marked him, whether we regard his paternal or his maternal descent.

He was born in 1742. His father died three years after his birth; and he was at first placed in the grammar-school of Haddington with the celebrated Henry Dundas, first Lord Melville, an accident which laid the foundation of an intimate friendship that continued with unabated affection through both their lives, both ending within a few days of each other; for Lord Melville died the night before his ancient comrade's remains were consigned to the grave. From Haddington he was removed to the High School at Edinburgh, and became Dux, or head by merit, of the Rector's class, at the time of his leaving that celebrated seminary.

That he pursued his studies, both at school and college with assiduity and with success, we have irrefragable proof in those tastes for classical learning which ever remained with him, and those habits of learned reading which he intermingled with his professional studies, though somewhat less continually indulged than his inclination would naturally have prompted, in consequence of an indolent turn of mind and body, which led him, when the fatigues of the day were past, to indulge a good deal in what the Italians term the dolce far niente, elevated in their sultry and exhausting climate to the dignity of a saint.(a) But the style of his speeches often betokened that his eloquence was drawn from pure sources, and formed upon antique models.

He was admitted an advocate in 1764, and obtained a considerable share of practice from the first. When Mr. Dundas was made Lord Advocate, he was, with Messrs. Craig and Abercromby, afterwards judges, appointed one of his deputies, termed depute advocates, important officers, especially in the absence of their chief on his parliamentary duties, as on them are devolved the duties of the great and most beneficial office of public prosecutor; the institution for which we of England have daily occasion to envy our Scottish neighbours. Indeed, when we say most beneficial, we use a feeble expression. The necessity of this office is quite apparent to all who bestow a thought on the most important branch of our jurisprudence, the administration of criminal justice. Any thing more barbarous than the state of the English procedure in this respect cannot well be figured. We have already more than once had occasion to call the attention of our readers to it, that so great a defect may at length be supplied, and the duty of enforcing the law may no longer be left to mere haphazard, but confided to fit and to responsible hands; a change all the more necessary, now that we have allowed every prisoner to be defended by the skill and the eloquence and the learning of counsel.

The successor to Lord Melville as Solicitor-General, when he was made Lord Advocate, was, as a matter of course, to be looked for in the sacred family—that of Dundas,—not Mr. Blair, though an experienced advocate and eminent lawyer—not Mr. Blair, though the Lord Advocate Dundas's most ancient and chosen friend, was ever thought of for his successor; but a young gentleman of fair talents, excellent character, and pleasing manners, was pitched upon, in the person of Mr. Robert Dundas, Lord Melville's son-in-law by marriage, and nephew by birth, and he, at the early age of four-and-twenty, was first made Solicitor-General, and afterwards, at the somewhat more mature age of twenty-seven, Lord Advocate, public prosecutor, and minister for Scotland. Thus, however, were things in those days managed among our northern neighbours, who, inured to the family propensities so cherished by the feudal system, never marvelled at any advantage conferred by relationship to a great man, nor concerned themselves in solving the indeterminate problem of comparing merit with birth, which they were taught to regard as incommensurate quantities, and no more dreamt of comparing them together, than of subtracting pounds sterling from pounds avoirdupois.

In 1789, Mr. Blair, not at the Dundas—solicitor age of twenty-four, or even at the Dundas—advocate age of twenty-seven, but at the more mature age of forty-seven, was at length made Solicitor-General, and was then in the height of favour both with the country and the courts. His practice was extensive; his learning varied, accurate, and profound; his judgment sound as well as penetrating; so that his opinion had weight, not only with the Profession, but with the judges, who seemed, when they felt reluctantly compelled to decide against him, to feel afraid, and almost to apologise for the liberty they took. His official rank of course increased his already ample share of business, and his retiring nature leading him to feel abundantly contented with the eminence which he had attained, he more than once refused to be made a judge. This occurred in 1795, when pressed to it by the Government, especially by the Chancellor, Lord Loughborough, on which occasion the Secretary of State communicated in very flattering terms the King's regret, but also his Majesty's full sense of the motives which had governed the refusal, "and which had rather raised than lowered him in the King's opinion." The same occurrence was repeated in 1801, when the office of Justice Clerk, chief criminal judge, was vacant by Lord Braxfield's decease. This, the second station in the profession, and leading surely to the first, was refused by the high-minded individual whose history we are recording, and on a ground as rare as it is noble. He felt apprehensive, though not above threescore years of age, that he might not have strength of body to sit out, in the requisite vigour of mind, a long criminal trial. "Therefore," said he, "I cannot think of accepting an office of such importance, with the prospect before my eyes of being obliged, in any important occurrence, to allow the duty to be discharged by others. You may be assured," he adds, "it is not a pleasant reflection for me to think that I am thus excluded from any promotion in the line of my profession to which I might otherwise have been thought entitled. But I have seriously considered the matter over and over again, and my mind has long been made up to it. The only situation I can look to when I quit my present office, is that of an ordinary Judge of the Court of Session, and that I shall accept when you desire me to do it." —This letter was addressed to Lord Melville, and we may add, that an ordinary judge of the Court of Session has no criminal business to transact. Another illustrious lawyer, Mr. Cranstoun, afterwards Lord Corehouse, always declined taking the promotion and emoluments of a criminal judge, upon somewhat of the same high sense of honour and feeling of public duty. We rather hope than believe that the Bar of either country can afford other instances of public virtue to place by the side of those two great men—the lights of the Scottish Bar, and the just objects of universal veneration. (b)

In 1802, when Mr. Dundas became Chief Baron, he was succeeded as Lord Advocate by Mr. Charles Hope, Mr. Blair declining to fill an office which would have entailed upon him the necessity of parliamentary attendance, to which his own modesty, far rather than any real deficiency, pronounced him inadequate. In like manner he allowed Sir James Montgomery to go over his head when Mr. Hope succeeded Lord Eskgrove, as Justice Clerk in the winter of 1805.

Mr. Blair thus continued from 1789 to 1806 in the office of Solicitor-General. On Mr. Pitt's death at the beginning of the latter year, the Grenville administration was formed, and Mr. John Clerk was appointed Solicitor-General, Mr. Henry Erskine in like manner superseding Sir James Montgomery as Lord Advocate. Upon the dissolution of the Grenville ministry in 1807, the division of the Court of Session into two branches being resolved upon, and the new bill being to take effect in 1808, it was known that Sir Ilay Campbell intended to resign upon that event, and therefore Mr. Blair did not resume his office of Solicitor-General. He was in 1808 raised to the high office of Lord President, which he filled till his lamented death in June 1811. We have noticed the melancholy coincidence of that event with the decease of his oldest and most intimate friend Lord Melville. In fact, the suddenness of the President's death gave a shock to his friend which, operating on an organic complaint of the heart, proved fatal. He went to bed on Friday, the 11th of June, intending to attend the President's funeral the day after, but he was found dead in his bed on that morning. The President himself had been in perfect health till the preceding Sunday when he felt somewhat indisposed, but so slightly that he walked out as usual before dinner. In returning home his gait was observed to be less firm than usual. He reached his house however, when he fell into the servant's arms, and in a quarter of an hour expired. Lord Melville's complaint, apparently of the same class, had for eight or nine years been known to exist, and with his wonted firmness of mind, he had drawn up an account of the symptoms, exceedingly detailed and accurate, and almost learned, which he was accustomed to shew any medical man that might beset him with inquiries, directed, as the veteran politician and experienced Scotchman was prone to suspect, partly to improving the inquirer's knowledge of the disease, partly to improving his acquaintance with the minister.

The President's funeral was attended by all the judges, by the heads of the Bar, by the professors of the University, and by a deputation of the General Assembly, then in session. The ceremonial is said to have been solemn and imposing, as far at least as the funerals of our northern neighbours can reach that pitch; for, instead of our noble and affecting service, it is well known that they only stand, covered and silent, by the grave, till the earth is put on the coffin, and then, taking off their hats as a last token of respect, disperse.

Mr. Blair was married to Miss Isabella Hackett, youngest daughter of Colonel Hackett Craigie of Lawhill, representative of one of the ancient families in Fifeshire. By her he had one son, now member of the Supreme Court of Corfu, and three daughters, the eldest of whom is married to Mr. Maconochie, who, after filling the offices of Solicitor-General and Lord Advocate, was afterwards a judge by the title of Lord Meadowbank.

The preceding account of the President's rare disinterestedness in respect of professional advancement will have prepared the reader for the statement that he left an exceedingly limited fortune to his family. It will also prepare him to approve entirely of the just distribution of royal favour by which Mr. Perceval conferred on the widow and daughters an adequate pension, Lord Meadowbank, however, refusing, though not then in office, any portion of that liberality to his wife. There is great satisfaction in dwelling upon such traits both in the President, his son-in-law, and the government, all having well performed their parts upon the melancholy occasion. We may add that no man could be more spotless in his whole private as well as public character. In every relation of life he was blameless and sincere; for, beside being a most kind member of his own family, his generosity to his friends, when required for their relief, was far from being always limited by a prudent regard to his own means. He more than once made himself liable for their losses, and relieved them from embarrassment by incurring their responsibilities.

In approaching the task of estimating his merits, while at the Bar or on the Bench, we must remark that the indolence already referred to was far indeed from being the listless idleness of empty and frivolous minds, whose inaction leaves little to regret, inasmuch as their negligence would be as fruitful of good (possibly more fruitful) as their impotent acting or their prava libertate. Blair's was rather the vis inertiæ of great faculties than the aversion of little men to labour. He had been a steady and a diligent student; the whole principles of our jurisprudence were known to him with familiarity, and applied by him with an ease that proved this familiar acquaintance; nor did he ever, on any occasion, shew the least disposition to withdraw from work when the interests of his client or his public duty required it. Nay, it is very possible, that when ordinary observers thought they perceived him sitting inactive and unoccupied, his mind was like that of Mr. Fox, who loved the like relaxation, both from work and from talk, could but the lovers of talk leave him to his enjoyment, and who certainly was not lost in a wool-gathering reverie all the while, but generally occupying his great faculties with the exercise he most loved—the pursuing trains of reasoning, and forging, as it were, chains of argumentation without any definite object on which to use them—a peculiarity which made Lord Brougham apply to him the lines in Homer upon the labours of Vulcan's forge. As an instance at once of Blair's industry as well as of his conscientious nature, the fact may be mentioned, that, upon being raised to the bench, he actually read through, with care and diligence, the whole of Erskine's and of Stair's Institutes. We recollect Sir V. Gibbs being very much edified when calling on Sir James Mansfield, and finding him in bed, to see that he was reading Coke Littleton.

The genius of Blair was eminently fitted for legal pursuits. Of a bold and masculine understanding, a penetrating sagacity, and profound reflection, without the subtlety of Matthew Ross,—with little of the penetrating acuteness, almost preternatural, of William Tait, who was occasionally the dupe of his own quickness,—with little fancy in inventing topics, and no great nimbleness in meeting or escaping objections,—he yet always brought to bear upon his subject a plain and homely vigour, to which almost all difficulties yielded, and before which almost all antagonists gave way. His style, too, both of reasoning and of diction, bore the impress of his nature; they were plainly suited to the man; they were racy and they were apposite. The hearer never for a moment doubted that the speaker thoroughly understood the whole matter in hand, and was perfect master of it. Despising the vulgar arts of ordinary advocates, he unfolded the subject to all exactly as he saw it himself; and his comments had so much force, were so plain, yet so strong, and clothed with so much dignity of expression, as well as presented with so much gravity and yet earnestness of manner, that his discourse seemed rather judicial than forensic, and he appeared to decide the cause he was pleading. So earnest a manner is generally an abatement of dignity; yet in this speaker it proved not so; his vehemence, even though sustained by little fluency, and set off by less felicity of diction, never for an instant led the hearers or the spectators to undervalue him, and withhold respect, as is wont to happen when, in the fervour of declamation, the orator, seeming to lose the command of himself, is nearly sure to lose the sway over his audience. We have spoken of his fluency as inconsiderable; but this had no bad effect; for, as you saw a mind struggling with the topic, you perceived that the ideas were too many to find easy utterance: there was none of the unpleasant anxiety attending a hesitating speaker, and which is unpleasing because it gives alarm. The thoughts were there, and struggling for birth, and, in one way or another, were sure to reach the audience. Occasionally he rose to a higher pitch than merely the height of argumentation—if, indeed, any higher pitch there be. No one who had the advantage of hearing his noble speech in the case of Heriot, the descendant of the founder of the hospital, will easily forget the fine burst of impassioned and indignant eloquence with which he denounced the cruel injustice of disputing the founder's wish for his kindred. "What avails it, my lords, that a great benefactor of his species should generously devote the hard earnings of a long life to the sacred uses of charity, if no sooner he is laid in his grave than all he most fondly favoured are repudiated, all his cherished objects cast into oblivion, all his darling plans scorned? &c." From what has been said of his manner of reasoning, it must not me supposed that the contrast with Matthew Ross and William Tait implies any admission of his having been either at all wanting in the quickness wherewith the latter was so singularly gifted, or in the capacity for handling the greatest subtleties of the law which so eminently distinguished the former of those great masters of legal dialectics. The reference was rather made to the manner than to the matter of their disceptation—for there was no man of more clear and swift apprehension in dealing with a case, how obscure and complicated soever. This he owed to his extraordinary power of fixing his attention undivided on his subject. Nor was there any subtlety of the law, however refined and remote from ordinary apprehension, which he was not at all times prepared to embrace and to pursue. To say this of him is only saying what no one could doubt, that he had an eminently legal and logical understanding.

In one particular it might be, perhaps, expected that a person who, albeit of high poetical descent, had never cultivated the powers of imagination, should yet be no mean master of sarcasm, and even of ordinary ridicule. It is true he rarely indulged in this, and chiefly brought its force to bear upon the absurdity of an adverse position. But a most accurate observer, and who had long and closely watched him (Baron Hume), has said that he "was noted for a command of sarcastic wit and raillery, though he never left the case to seek for opportunities of indulging in this vein, his wit being ever to the point, and, as it were, wit and argument in one." The same excellent judge has also said, in praise, as well of his honesty as his good sense and severe taste, that he "was remarkable for never stooping to make use of a frivolous or futile argument."

At the advanced age of sixty-six he ascended the bench, and then was seen in all its great glory the first quality of his nature, an innate love of justice and abhorrence of iniquity, "without which," a celebrated writer, Professor Playfair, tells us, "the President was accustomed emphatically to declare all other qualities in a judge avail nothing, or rather are worse than nothing." This shone conspicuously through his whole life, but more especially when he sat on the bench. He had, indeed, intuitively (as Baron Hume has observed) a generous contempt of any thing low or disingenuous." His patience was equally eminent; and as the same high authority has well said, extended "both to parties and their advocates; while his endowments were graced by an earnest and vivid elocution, and by a natural dignity of manner, and an animated majesty of countenance, which struck the evil-doer with awe, and gave assurance of the native worth and energy of the spirit that reigned within."

The same high authority has told us that he had a most admirable quality for a judge, proceeding from the manly and honest nature of his understanding. He took liberal and enlarged views of law, but abstained, as he disdained it, from hunting after novelties, and making discoveries in the law he was bound to administer. He was thus wholly free from the great vice of clever and ingenious men, what in Westminster Hall is termed a love of crotchets, a most fruitful parent of error and misdecision, and which

(b) When Lord Corehouse had been made [illegible] by the former government, a discussion (in 1810) arose in the House of Lords, redounding to the high honour, and [illegible], of this distinguished person

thus makes judges unjust. In like manner was he slow to interrupt or anticipate counsel, a habit proceeding from petty conceit, and greatly to be repressed on the Bench. "Quantum (says Lord Bacon, discoursing of this love of crotchets) ad advocatos qui causas agunt, patientia et gravitas in causis audiendis, justitiæ est pars essentialis; et judex nimis interloquens minime est cymbalum bene sonans. Non laudi est judici si primus aliquid in causâ inveniat et arripiat quod ab advocatis, suo tempore, melius audiri potuisset; aut acumen ostentet in probationibus vel advocatorum perorationibus nimis cito interrumpendis; aut anticipet informationes quæstionibus, licet ad rem pertinentibus." (Fideles Sermones, art. 54, De Officio Judicis.) We have already noticed his exemplary patience; and his reproofs, being most rarely administered, produced extraordinary effect. But it was in nowise for the sake of this effect that he proved so sparing of them; his mingled sense of justice and feeling of humanity induced him to keep in mind the same wise man's maxim: "Etiam reprehensiones de loco superiore graves esse debent non contumeliosæ." (Ib. art. 11, De Magistratibus.)

It is said that he was somewhat dilatory in the execution of the judicial office, and that an arrear was springing up in his court. But the advanced age at which he came to the chair may be one cause of this, and the novelty of the system he was called to administer, after the division of the court, was another. Take him for all in all, it may be safely affirmed that he presented one of the most perfect examples of forensic and judicial capacity combined in the same person which the annals of either Bar afford. Therefore, before all judges in all countries he is to be held constantly up to admiration and to imitation, and his memory by all lawyers must be borne in lasting remembrance.

JOURNAL OF PROPERTY.

SALE OF RAILWAY SHARES IN COMPANIES NOT COMPLETELY REGISTERED.

IN our last number we gave the opinions of the Attorney-General and Mr. Ogle on a case embracing four points of this question. We are now enabled to give a fifth question, and their opinion thereon.

"Fifth.—If the restrictive clauses of the Act 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110, do not apply to railway companies, whether the sale of letters of allotment, bankers' receipts, or scrip, be or be not illegal, notwithstanding they are so excluded?"

"Being of opinion that the restrictive clauses of 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110, apply to railway companies formed after the 1st of November last, it only remains for us to observe, that as to companies established before the 1st of November last, we do not think, independently of the statute, that the sale of letters of allotment, bankers' receipts, or scrip, would be illegal." "FRED. THESIGER,
Inner Temple. "RICH. OGLE."

LIABILITIES OF JOINT-SOCK COMPANIES.—Associations of capitalists with limited responsibility encourage enterprise and experiment. When the possible loss is to be divided among a number, new channels of trade and new inventions of machinery have a better chance of obtaining a fair trial. On the other hand, associations of capitalists with limited responsibility are apt to be rash in their undertakings, negligent and slovenly in prosecuting them. The loss to each is not great, and risks are run which no man would venture upon were a considerable sum at hazard. The fractional share of the possible gain is too inconsiderable to stimulate to persevering attention. There is an association in Scotland, instituted more for beneficent than for moneymaking purposes, but which we notice at present because it has been led, apparently by the pressure of external circumstances, to adopt a mode of action combining to a considerable extent the advantages of limited with those hitherto derived from unlimited responsibility only. The West of Scotland Guarantee Association was instituted principally, we believe, with a view to assist deserving young men by providing bonds of security, at inconsiderable risk to its wealthy members, for the "actings and intromissions" of persons in situations of trust. There is a similar association in London; but in the case of savings banks, Government declined to accept the bonds of any society as security. The West of Scotland Association obviates this difficulty, by some of the directors, according to an arrangement at a meeting of the board, giving their names as private individuals. A special minute is made of the transaction, and, under a clause in the company's deed of constitution, the entire body of shareholders are bound to relieve the directors. The individual has thus a sufficient motive to act warily, and becomes a guarantee to the public for the company of which he is a member. His responsibility is unlimited as to the special business devolved upon him; limited as to the general operations of the association.—Spectator.

CAUTION TO AUCTIONEERS.—There is a provision in an Act of last session (8 Vict. c. 15), which seems to have escaped attention. By the 8th section it is provided (and the provision extends to the whole of the United Kingdom), That any person acting as an auctioneer, who shall not at the time of any sale by auction, on demand of any officer of excise or customs, or any officer of stamps and taxes, produce his license, or does not at once deposit with the officer 10*l.* he may be taken before a magistrate, and committed to the county gaol or house of correction, for any time not exceeding a month, which imprisonment shall not prevent other proceedings; but in case of the deposit as mentioned, if a license in existence at the time of the sale shall be produced within a week, the money is to be returned, otherwise to be accounted for to the Commissioners of Excise.

CAUTION TO AUCTIONEERS.—At a sale on Saturday last, in Russell-mews, Mr. Dixon, the celebrated horse auctioneer, was accosted by a person who stated that he was an excise officer, and demanded to see his license. Fortunately Mr. Dixon was provided with the necessary document, or there is no doubt he would have been fixed with the penalty. We cannot believe that the Commissioners of Excise sanction such proceedings.

Park-place Villas, Maida-hill West, a delightful spot.

MR. SINGLE will SELL by AUCTION, at the Mart, on Tuesday, April 15, at Twelve for One, unless previously disposed of by private contract, a very handsome and neat attractive VILLA RESIDENCE, one of a detached pair, situate and known as No. 16, Park-place Villas, Maida-hill West, a most eligible and healthy situation, surrounded by villas of a highly respectable character, which precludes the possibility of its being deteriorated by buildings of an inferior description. It commands a fine view of the country, and is approached by fore-court and bold portico entrance, and contains a good hall, a lofty and most handsomely finished drawing room and dining-room, first floor, two spacious bed rooms and dressing room, second floor, four bedrooms, and water-closet; basement usual domestic conveniences, &c.; built at an incredible expense, recently in the occupation of the owner, at present in hand; lease, about ninety-three years; ground-rent, 7l. 10s. only.

Particulars are now ready, and may be obtained of J. Wright, esq. solicitor, 7, Rathbone-place, Oxford-street, and at the offices of Mr. SINGLE, Surveyor and Land-agent, 34, Coleman street, near the Bank of England.

Kent. Freehold, above 30 acres, Beer-Shop, small Houses, Brickfield, &c. on the High-road.

MR. SINGLE will SELL by AUCTION, at the Mart, opposite the Bank of England, in one Lot, on TUESDAY, July 1st, at twelve for one o'clock, a Valuable Property as above, situate about one mile from Green-st. Green, on the main road from Dartford to Meopham. It comprises a capital and unusually well-built superior BEER-SHOP, known as the Queen's Head, a small HOMESTEAD attached, and about 24 Acres of excellent LAND, chiefly Arable, and part Brickfield, let to Mr. C. Johnson, a worthy and very old tenant, on an agreement for lease expiring in about another year. And about 8 Acres of thriving ORCHARD, with THREE TENEMENTS thereon, let at about 10l. per annum. A license could no doubt be at once obtained to the Beer-shop, and therefore nearly 1,000l. added to its value without outlay. The ground could be ... pr... ... present. The Br... rth ... large in quantity, and excellent in quality. The ... profits of brick making now ... render observatio... n ... head ...

Particulars will ... ready in due time, and may be obtained of Messrs. Fro... and Dixon, solicitors, Basinghall-street; at the offices of Mr. SINGLE, Surveyor and Land Agent, 34, Colem... the Bank of England.

Important Sale. ... Dock, Wharf, Granary, &c. on ... and Freehold Houses adjoining.

MR. SINGLE will SELL by AUCTION, at Garraway's, Cornhill City, on Wednesday, June 11, at Twelve for One o'clock, in five Lots, that most important and highly valuable Freehold Property, known as the FORE and AFT DOCK, also WHARFS, WAREHOUSES, and SHOPS, &c. &c. The Dock is contiguous to and opens direct into the most crowded part of the River Thames, is admirably situate for St. Katherine's and the London Docks, &c. &c., possesses peculiar and invaluable advantages for business, and is capable of holding two vessels of considerable size. The Dock gates are made on an improved principle for convenience and economy. Also, a Freehold Coal Wharf adjoining, Granary, Blacksmith's Shop, &c. &c. and three Freehold Dwelling-houses, two with Shops, situate Nos. 24, 25, and 27, Bermondsey-wall, opposite the aforesaid Dock; the whole capable of great improvement.

Essex.—Freehold Estate, Leigh, near Southend, Residence, Cottages, and Building-ground.

MR. SINGLE will SELL by AUCTION, at the Mart, opposite the Bank of England, on Tuesday, July 1, at Twelve for One o'clock, in lots, a capital RESIDENCE, at present in the occupation of Mr. J. Ball as yearly tenant. It contains wash-house, oven, &c., pantry, larder, &c.; first floor, two bed-rooms and lumber-room; second, two attics. ... front is ornamented with a tasteful verandah throughout. On the roof is a summer seat, to enjoy the ecstatic delights of perhaps the finest marine and land scenery in the kingdom. There is a large extent of ground, about 430 feet from front to back, lying on an inclined plane towards the road, and presenting a frontage on the road of about 55 feet, which any would esteem most important as a building frontage. The said road is a most contiguous to the mouth of the river Thames. A somewhat similar, but larger and superior, Residence to the above formerly occupied by the Rev. H. Scott and now let at only 21l. per annum, a sum too inadequate to convey any idea of its value. Also nine Cottages on the same estate. The population of Leigh has doubled itself within a very few years, and houses are in great demand there. A purchaser, therefore, with any ordinary judgment could lay out a little money upon this property and render it worth more than double its present value. Leigh is only three miles from the fashionable and flourishing watering-place Southend.

Particulars will be ready in due time, and may be obtained of E. Clark, esq. 5, Chancery-lane, or at the offices of Mr. SINGLE, Surveyor and Land Agent, 34, Coleman street, near the Bank of England.
